FIVE GOOD
"V-P"
MODELS
for
YOUR
"TROUSSEAU"

No. 2239-40-K

A dress for young women and misses, to be made of soft silk, batiste or linen. The waist is cut kimono fashion with panel front. Waist and skirt, 50 cents each.

No. 2228-K

A dress one can wear on trips to town, suitable for charmeuse, sponge and faille. Waist opens at side-front under full length tucked vest. Waist and skirt, 50 cents each.

WHEN you pack your trunk this Summer you will feel much happier if it holds these five Vogue models. You will know you are appropriately equipped for many different occasions. And there will be no sudden disappointments a month or two hence, after your path has led you far from the shops and the mantua-makers.

These five patterns have been so warmly approved that we can heartily recommend them to you. Out of the scores of new models that we launched this Spring, these five have been among the most popular. When a model wins a decided success, we do not hesitate to republish it and tell you that other readers are liking it. In this way our judgment is backed by the judgment of all women who use Vogue Patterns.

"I have a competent seamstress," writes a New Mexico reader. "I buy a Vogue Pattern, and wear the result serenely, knowing that my dresses are cut on the best lines. Because I only attempt simple effects, my gowns have the intangible something that spells style."

This "intangible something"—so easy to recognize, so hard to capture—will be yours if you use any or all the five Vogue Patterns pictured on this page. Please state size when ordering.

VOGUE PATTERN SERVICE
443 Fourth Avenue New York City

No. 2286-K

Attractive blouse, suitable for crepe linen, chiffon or silk. Waist opens in the center under a shallow vest; it is cut with a yoke to which the tucked fronts and backs are attached. The one-piece sleeves are completed by narrow turn-over cuffs. Price 50 cents.

No. 1764-K

Evening gown of white Breton lace, with color note of American Beauty rose given in satin ribbon draped on corsage and falling to the hem. The simple bodice is in surplice effect, one side of lace and the other chiffon. Price 50 cents for bodice or skirt.

No. 2198-K

Another blouse for linen, batiste or crepe. The waist may be worn either opened or closed at the neck, and a separate standing collar is included in the pattern. The one-piece sleeve is finished at the wrist with a band cuff opening at the back. Price 50 cents.

Pamilla Cotton

Make your tub frocks of Pamilla Cotton and the sun will not fade them.

Here is your little girl in a cross-bar Pamilla dress—simple, easily made at home, susceptible of infinite variety.

Pamilla Cotton comes in thirty-six different designs. In figures or stripes it is equally attractive for young ladies, and will give you a well-dressed figure.

All the above sketches show garments made of Pamilla Cotton after Vogue patterns. Irish lace buttons; a jabot of lace and a jaunty tie, give the effect of an expensive costume, and if made at home after Vogue or any other simple pattern the cost need not exceed five dollars. A suitable costume is now within the reach of all.

You will be in style this summer if you have tub frocks made of Pamilla Cotton. Your dresses will hold their color and you will save the expense of having them re-dyed if you use Pamilla Cotton.

Make sure the name "Pamilla Cotton" is on the selvage—then you are safe. If your dealer does not carry Pamilla Cotton, let us send samples.

Variety on Variety

Two duties confront us in sending this department to press: inserting new advertisements and changing the old ones as directed. There is nothing stable about these announcements; varying with the seasons, they pile variety on variety.

Watch this department especially during the coming months, for some altogether new offerings will be made this summer.

Vogue's
Summer Plans

There is a wonderfully fine collection of bathing suits in this number. Turn to pages 52 and 53. You will make a better appearance on any beach from Newport to Santa Barbara if your wardrobe includes at least one of these charming and original models.

If you are going abroad this summer, let Vogue tell you just where to shop and where to stay. Do not choose a Paris dressmaker at random; write to Vogue and we will tell you where to get the clothes you want and at the price you care to buy.

Keep Vogue by your side this summer. All our services remain open. You can shop through Vogue, as page 118 points out. You can buy Vogue Patterns. Five sensible designs are shown on page 8. And because the march of the fashions is never ending, you can study the new models produced this summer and punctually reported in the next five numbers of Vogue. Then when the time arrives to plan your Fall wardrobe, you will have stolen a march upon those women who heedlessly shut their eyes to the fashions in July and August.

Vogue takes no holiday. Be sure that Vogue goes with you on yours. Send Vogue word at least a fortnight before you change your address.

The Next Vogue
EUROPEAN
and TRAVEL
Number

Dated June 15. On Sale June 9

You will be better prepared for your summer travels if you read the next Vogue before embarking. And if you are not traveling this year, this next number will carry you in imagination to delightful places overseas.

Vogue is one of the most cosmopolitan of magazines. Therefore we find it an especially congenial task to devote one number a year to travel, and to the scenes that await you at your journey's end.

Last year we followed the course of American empire to Panama; this year we go westward to Manila, that amazing American city with its trolleys and motors, and electric lights, set on the edge of a savage tropical island.

From Manila the next Vogue takes you to Tokio and the Mikado's annual garden party. Standing under the imperial cherry trees, you watch the Emperor and his suite parading through the palace gardens.

And in planning our travels we have not forgotten what to take; for the next Vogue tells how to select traveling clothes and luggage, and all the little comforts that make life pleasant in steamship, train, and hotel.

The London season will be at its height when this number is on sale, and an article by the Hon. Mrs. Fitzroy Stewart on the American peeresses who are foremost hostesses in London, will be of special interest.

SOCIAL MAGNETS OF PARIS FASHION

The tiny hat, the high frill, and the throat band suggest a dainty Nattier portrait

The Gala Conferences, the Art Exhibitions, the Longchamp Races, and the Theatres, Especially the New Théâtre Champs Elysées, These Are the Lodestones Which Draw Smart Women to See and to be Seen

THE first of a series of gala conferences at the Université des Annales was held a few days ago when Edouard Herriot gave a delightful causerie on the works of Edmond Rostand. "Cantique de l'Aile" afforded an excellent opportunity for apt remarks about the German dirigible which recently soared over the frontier and dropped into a French camp. The audience was wild with enthusiasm when Edmond Rostand read selections from his own pen, and very much amused when he made an obeisance in the direction of the loge which was occupied by his talented wife and son, and referred to them as his "formidable family."

Paris is conference mad; so much so that many of the theatres have to open their doors at half-past four to the hundreds which never fail to appear to applaud some popular conférencier, and to encore the inevitable song and dance. A conference by André de Fouquières was backed by a colored cake-walk, Anna Held, and "The Belle of New York," the last delivered with an extremely French accent and many French gestures.

THE FLY-AWAY HAT TRIMMINGS

Judging by the success of its inaugural fête, the new Comédie des Champs Elysées bids fair to become one of the most popular conference playhouses. At its opening Marcel Prévost gave an interesting talk on "La Femme et le Théâtre," but because of the waving forest of aigrettes immediately in front of me I could see neither the lecturer nor the fair actresses who assisted him, so I fell to admiring the hats.

At my left was a crownless hat—unless the single thickness of tulle which was fitted closely over the head might be dignified by the name of "crown." The tulle was exceedingly sheer, and so showed the perfectly dressed blond hair underneath. Over this, set low on the head, was a brim of black, glacé straw trimmed in the back with paradise feathers. At my right was a confection consisting of an enormous bow of black moire posed at a perilous angle on the side of a tiny calotte of glazed straw.

Tiny hats of black chip—so shiny that they look as if they had been treated with a coat of varnish—trimmed with fly-away bows of black moire ribbon, are very smart at the moment. Several blocked my view at this conference. These hats are usually so small that the hair quite fills the crown, and they are rendered piquant by the suggestion of a brim which rolls up close to the head on one side. A most audacious, three-looped bow of five-inch black moire ribbon is posed at a rakish angle. Similar hats of glazed chip are made with rather high, narrow crowns and exceedingly narrow brims. The one sketched at the left of this page was worn at Longchamp. The open corsage, the frill of tulle, and the band of velvet high about the throat, are all suggestive night" at the Théâtre Champs Elysées, which, under the clever management of M. Gabriel Astruc, has become the most formidable rival of the Paris Opera. It is here that nowadays one sees the most brilliant audiences.

A FAN REVIVAL

Mrs. Astor carried the huge fan of black ostrich which is shown in the lower sketch on this page. A young woman in the same loge waved the quill fan sketched at the top of the same group. It was quite as large as Mrs. Astor's, but was of an irregular shape, resembling a spread swan's wing. The duchesse de Talleyrand (née Gould), who sat on the opposite side of the house, carried the interesting, old, painted fan shown in the middle of the group. It harmonized well with her soft frock of pink satin with its bodice of tulle and silver lace. A full-blown rose was placed high in her dark hair.

Mrs. Vanderbilt appeared in one of the simple frocks which she so much affects and which so well become her. The wonderful black necklace she so frequently wears was thrown into charming contrast by a closely draped bodice of emerald green. On this same evening Mrs. Potter Palmer wore a rich gown of black lace with touches of violet on the corsage. Instead of a tiara she wore a black aigrette in her coiffure.

The comfortable arm-chairs and the perfect ventilation added not a little to the enjoyment of a play at the new Comédie Elysées where M. Poirier recently presented Kistemaekers's "L'Exilée" with clever Martha Brandès in the leading rôle. Monna Delza, who has an important part in the play, wears, in one act, a simple frock of champagne-colored satin, long-sleeved and exceedingly high-waisted. The narrow skirt, instead of being hemmed at the bottom, is finished with a half-inch binding of satin which is curiously effective. Monna Delza is gowned by Doucet.

The costumes for Richépin's Persian poem-play, "Le Minaret," at the Théâtre Renaissance, were designed by Paul Poiret, who loves nothing so much as the splendid, barbaric dress of the orient. In the costumes for this picturesque play he has excelled even himself. The favorites of the harem are robed in silver tissue and black gauze, in rose and emerald, and in yellow and vivid blue, all gorgeously embroidered and fringed. Unique and beautiful are the head-dresses of pearls and gold, and the sandals with pointed toes that curve upward in golden spirals.

Two very attractive gowns which were seen in a little playette are shown at the upper right, on this page. The tea-gown of Malines lace was hung over pale pink chiffon, and was girdled with Saxe-blue velvet drawn through a buckle of jet. A band of rose-colored satin and folds of white tulle formed the corsage. Over this was worn a mantle of Saxe-blue chiffon with a wired collar of Malines. Particularly pretty were the long sleeves of blue chiffon. The young girl's dress shown at the right was of tilleul chiffon, flounced at intervals with Alençon lace. A girdle of brick-colored velvet added a pretty note of color. A half-blown rose was placed at the waistline, and another appeared at the top of the lowest flounce.

ARTISTS IN OILS AND IN DRESS

Art exhibitions are the order of the day. In addition to several smaller exhibitions there is the "Arts and Decorations" at the Louvre, the works of David and his pupils at the Petit Palais, Dannat at the Galeries Georges

A theatrical sketch was the "mise en scène" for a tea-gown that blended perfectly a half dozen colors

Petit, and, latest of all, the Spring Salon. At a private view at the Salon I noticed particularly a pleasing portrait of Mme. Poincaré and one of the familiar features of Enrico Caruso. There were two or three nudes by Eugene Ullman which suggested Manet.

It is with a great deal of pleasure this year that one turns to the dignified canvases in the David exhibition. Raising my eyes from a mellow Fragonard at the sound of an English voice at my elbow, I found myself but three paces from the energetic, little, blue-hatted figure of Christabel Pankhurst. I watched her for some minutes as she moved restlessly through the rooms. A far cry it seemed from the stately, pictured ladies on the walls—the Madame Récamiers, the Empress Josephines, and the other beauties of old-world fame—to this bit of fugitive militancy. My eyes were still bent on the doorway through which Miss Pankhurst had disappeared, when a woman entered clad in a sable cloak so handsome that one involuntarily wondered what marvel of a gown it concealed. A moment later, when she threw open her wrap, I saw the front of an exquisitely simple frock of white crêpe belted with a wide, violet ribbon, and fastened all the way down the front with white ball-buttons. The deep square of the bodice top was filled in with a V of tulle edged with a plaited tulle frill so wide that it almost framed her small, dark face. Her stockings were of violet silk, and she wore steel-buckled cothurns of black velvet.

SEEN BETWEEN THE SHOWERS

Sudden showers are characteristic of Paris weather, so an umbrella usually completes the toilettes of all who are not in motors. The pleasure seekers who were lured to Longchamp by the brilliancy of the sun on the day of the opening race of the spring season were met at the gate by a deluge which ruffled many tempers and ruined countless frocks.

The hat of black tagal sketched on this page presented a sorry sight after the shower. It was conspicuous as being the first smart, large hat that has appeared thus far. Its sole trimming was a band with a flat bow of black grosgrain ribbon and a fold of black tulle which overhung the broad brim.

After the shower the promenade was gay with people who were forced to wade through pools of water in the most fragile of black satin slippers—for with afternoon dress the Parisienne is shod as if for a ball. The climax in gossamer hosiery was reached to-day when a manikin appeared in black, fish-net stockings. They were quite as open and quite as transparent as the familiar, diamond-mesh veil, and they made their wearer very conspicuous. Equally transparent, although of a different texture, were the stockings worn by one of the best-dressed mondaines of Paris. They were of dark blue silk, and quite as sheer as the thinnest chiffon that ever came from the loom, so they served only to make the ankle conspicuous instead of covering it.

"WHO'S WHO" AT LONGCHAMP

Prominent society folk never miss the opening day of the Longchamp or Auteuil season; so in spite of the inclement weather there was a goodly showing of well-known people and many pretty frocks.

Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, who, contrary to the custom of so many even among the best-dressed women in Paris, is always gowned most appropriately for this sporting occasion, looked extremely pretty in a Chéruit coat of navy blue serge, a blue serge skirt, and a small turban of navy blue silk trimmed with black Numidie. Her costume is sketched in the upper left corner of page 24. A wide breadth of serge which hung loose from the waist-line in the back was caught up at the knees on each side of the front to form a pleasing skirt drapery. Two box plaits crossed the shoulders and buttoned at the throat with white pearl buttons. In the back these plaits widened as they fell from the shoulders and disappeared under the lower edge of the coat. The long sleeves were inconspicuously cuffed at the wrist.

The day following Mrs. Vanderbilt appeared in a suit of Bordeaux cloth very simply tailored, and a small black hat trimmed with a flaring bow of black moire. With Mrs. Vanderbilt were the Duchess of Marlborough and the Countess Széchenyi. The former looked extremely pretty in a frock of bronze-gray brocaded crêpe trimmed with black satin, and an exquisite black hat. The Countess Széchenyi wore a black satin gown and a Directoire coat of black ottoman silk which showed a hairline of white. Both coat and skirt were trimmed with white silk cord.

Navy blue serge was chosen by Madame Marghiloman (formerly Lady Avery) for her smart costume. The bolero was brightened by a waistcoat and cuffs of fine, yellow linen, trimmed with narrow linen flutings.

Another smart frock of blue serge, sketched at the lower left on this page, was girdled with a drapery of black satin. It was finished at the neck with a five-inch standing frill made of a single layer of sheer, white tulle with just enough fulness to make it flare up prettily about the ears. It narrowed as it approached the bust, where it disappeared.

Very dark brown broadcloth was worn by Princess Murat. Her suit was simply made with a godet fulness in the coat which was just long enough to cover the hips.

Madame Jean Stern was enveloped in a shapely mantle of broadtail, and Madame Maurice Ephrussi (née Rothschilds) wore a loose, three-quarter coat of tête-de nègre velvet, the irregular lower edge of which was bordered with Venise lace.

NOVELTIES APLENTY AT THE RACES

Crossing the paddock I saw a manikin in a high-waisted, Poiré frock and heelless cothurns of black satin. With her walked a companion shod with a pair of satin cothurns with extremely high heels of violet velvet. In the tribunes there were several frocks of black satin with wide, tightly draped girdles. The bodices were cut square down to the girdles and partially filled in with frills of black and white tulle.

The oddly pretty frock of chestnut satin sketched in the upper right corner of page 24 was worn with a hat trimmed with heron plumes. Frills of chestnut tulle finished the neck and sleeves. The jacket fronts passed under the arms and were tied in a large, flat bow in the back, and instead of a flower, clustered loops of wide, rose-colored ribbon adorned the corsage.

Equally chic was the frock of silk rep of a dull, mustard-green shade, also sketched on page 24. This frock was girdled with black satin, and the tucker and frill were of white tulle. A bronze quill was the only trimming on the small hat of black, glazed straw which quite concealed the right eye of the wearer.

There is always something new to see at the races—the latest confection in millinery, the newest whim in jewelry, or a manikin clad in the latest creation of the house she represents. At Longchamp I noticed some new pendant-earrings, emeralds this time instead of pearls. Cut square and surrounded by diamonds, they swung by the corners from short, slender, platinum chains. Another pair of similar earrings was diamond-shaped.

CHEZ LA MAISON LUCILE

Very rarely do couturiers show wedding gowns at their openings, and mourning gowns are almost unheard of! Lucile, however, showed both, and curiously enough it was a widow's trailing gown of black chiffon and tulle—very aptly called "Console-moi"—which was most admired. Worn by a tall, English girl who looked as if she had just stepped out of one of Du Maurier's drawings, it hung in graceful lines from a rather small, high waist. A long scarf consisting of a width of black tulle bound her hair and, falling to her heels, trailed on the floor.

The wedding gown of brocade was cut round length, and the veil, which was carried by bridesmaids gowned in pink chiffon, was as long as a court train, and was bordered on the edges with a rope of large pearls. One end of the veil was drawn over the face, and fell below the waist. It was held in place on the head by a simple filet of pearls and tiny nose-gays of orange blossoms above the ears.

Conspicuous in Lucile's collection are richly colored tea-gowns and dainty boudoir confections. Boudoir gowns were shown with the charming little caps bordered by tiny, shaped pieces of lace or embroidery which were wired to stand out over the ears. Also at this opening there were several one-piece, cloth dresses in white, in navy blue, and in gray. These were straight and slim, with very little fulness in the skirts and none at all in the waists. The bodices were drawn tightly over the bust and caught under wide belts that showed no wrinkle. A prominent feature of these dresses is the patch pocket which is placed rather low on each hip. Lucile's newest coats are suggestive of Zouave jackets, and the blouses have rolling collars of lace which turn down over the coats in back.

Last year this designer showed a great variety of pearl earrings; this year she uses diamonds. The earrings are very long, and frequently consist of four or five diamonds hung on a slender chain, with the smallest diamond at the lobe of the ear. Lucile favors the low coiffure with curls above the ear, and the head bound with braids. Her parasols have long handles and are carried like Tosca canes.

THE STREAMERED HAT

Streamers are occasionally seen on hats. The quaintest thing in streamers was worn by an English girl on one of the Longchamp race days. An inch-wide, black moire ribbon fell from the right side of the hat, was drawn across the throat and tossed over the left shoulder, where it hung in an unbroken line to the heels.

Lucile uses streamers, both wide and narrow, on many of her hats. She also uses the lace veil. This is not worn French fashion, but hangs from the brim of the hat in a typically English way. She also uses veils of tulle, with all the edges bound with extremely narrow cords of satin.

Hat-pins are becoming conspicuous again, not because of their size, but because they are worn in pairs. The smartest ones are made of fresh-water pearls and are placed directly in front, about four inches apart. E. G.

Seven times has His Imperial Majesty, the German Emperor, sat to Her Serene Highness, the Princess Lwoff-Parlaghy, for his portrait

The only portrait for which Prince Otto Bismarck, the Iron Chancellor, ever consented to sit was that painted by the Hungarian Princess

A PRINCESS WHO PAINTS ROYALTY

At the mere mention of the name, Princess Lwoff-Parlaghy, curiosity is piqued. Why does the Princess Lwoff-Parlaghy paint only men? How did it happen that Mr. Andrew Carnegie, who could never be induced to sit for any artist, was eager to have his portrait painted by the Princess? Who is this mysterious Princess, of whom New Yorkers occasionally catch a glimpse on the Avenue, in her coronet-decorated brougham?

After all, the reason that the Princess Lwoff-Parlaghy paints only men is, like all mysteries, when one gets to the heart of them, strikingly simple. The catalog of a woman's physical attractions—her regular features, her unlined forehead, her smiling eyes—is quite uninteresting to the artist who has painted the great men of the world. Why, indeed, should the Princess care to paint beautiful women, lovely as they are, when she has made the eyes of Bismarck, the German Emperor, and Sudermann live again on canvas? What would be the point in the Princess's depicting pretty hands with tapering, well-manicured fingers, when she is one of the few painters who can delineate the character in the hand of an emperor, king, or general?

Of course, it is perfectly true that some women have character in their hands and faces, and the Princess has painted a few such, but so far she has chosen only Europeans—grand duchesses, women whose countenances are full of individuality, and who are seventy years and upward. Youth, as such, seems apparently to have no charm for this artist.

The Princess has painted the German Emperor no less than seven times, and has also made portraits of the kings of Saxony, Wurtemberg, and Servia. At Marienbad, a few years since, at an exhibition of her paintings which she gave for the benefit of the Society for the Protection of Animals (the Princess's second passion, after art, is animals), she met King Edward VII; indeed, His Majesty had consented to open her exhibition for her. Shortly after this Edward sat to the Princess for his portrait. Besides these royalties, the Princess has to her credit a long list of the uncrowned kings of the world of art and literature.

A WOMAN WHO PAINTS MEN

But although she paints only famous men and women well in their prime, let no one imagine for a moment that the Princess despises youth and beauty or scorns them in her own person. She herself is young, and her face, pale as it is, is most attractive, although its charm is perhaps the second thing one would notice; there is in it so much latent strength that the beholder notes its power above any other quality. And then there is a glory of reddish golden hair that takes the breath.

One would think the Princess must be quite old to have painted the portraits of men who died some time ago, but she was a prodigy.

A Hungarian Serene Highness Who Consecrates Her Art, Not to Portraying the Physical Charms of Women, but to Limning the Character of Makers of History

By REBECCA HOOPER EASTMAN

Her Highness, the Princess Lwoff-Parlaghy, of Hungary, whose brush has caught the genius and the majesty of great men and kings

She was only thirteen when she painted the portrait of the great Hungarian patriot, Dictator Kossuth, a picture which was afterward purchased for a large sum by the Budapest Museum, and which received the gold medal of the Paris Salon.

To go even farther back, at the age of three, when most little girls are satisfied with dolls, the Princess was already drawing and singing. She "played" at real life, not at pure "make-believe." When she was a little older, she sang and accompanied herself so well that Franz Liszt once remarked that it was a pity she preferred to paint, because a great musical genius was thus lost to the world.

THE PORTRAITS AT THE PLAZA

Her Highness has just passed her fourth winter in New York, but every summer she returns to her castle in the Riviera. St. Jean Castle is a place of such allurements that one wonders that the Princess ever leaves it for America. It is situated in the little town of St. Jean, half-way between Monte Carlo and Nice. Here the studios are as large as assembly rooms, and the halls, like those of some great palace, are lighted by windows of exquisite stained glass. On the walls hang great Gobelin tapestries, and round the upper part of the great state dining-room runs a magnificent frieze by Procaccio which connoisseurs value at a million dollars.

The Princess's studio at the Plaza, New York, is hung with portraits, some finished, others in various stages of incompleteness, of great men. There is one of Mr. Joseph H. Choate, a personal friend of the Princess; a fine study of the late Whitelaw Reid, and others of Mr. Carnegie, Mr. Depew, Ambassador Herrick, Mr. Edwin Markham, and the Honorable Seth Low. At her remarkable studio, too, one is very apt to meet the originals of the portraits.

THE MAGNETIC PRINCESS

The Princess paints in the early afternoon, and her mornings are given over to privacy—to reading and studying. Once at her easel, she works with almost furious zeal. It is wonderful to see what was just now canvas and unrelated color spring into a detailed personality. Before dinner the Princess walks or drives alone, and perhaps in the evening she will receive some great man whom she wishes to study before painting.

In spite of her seclusion, the Princess has become extremely popular in America with those she does meet. There is every reason for this. She is magnetic, she is simple, she has caught the American spirit of democracy. One does not need to know her long to share with her that pleasantest of all friendly feelings—a sense of comradeship.

It is a joy to see with what consummate, yet wholly artless art she contrives to make the least person in the room feel as if he were something akin to her, and an integral part of her circle of friends.

AT THE SPRING

Within a grove of scented pines

There bubbled up a spring,

And thither, as if sacred lines

Enclosed it in a ring,

A man, to quaff, so softly crept

The linnets in the branches slept.

Another came to slake his thirst

With careless step—the clay

Fell in and fouled the spring. He cursed

And, cursing, strode away.

The linnets knew that they had seen

A lover, and a libertine.

W. P. PREBLE, JR.

Callot is often content to do unusually well what has frequently been done before. Here is nothing new nor unusual, but the soft charm of femininity is thoroughly understood and well interpreted. The designer reveals her partiality for the full skirt, a tendency to which she often reverts. The dress is a harmony of white lace, white satin, and rose satin (used in bands down the front)

That first essential in a gown—line—seems almost to have been neglected in this Callot model. The pale blue chiffon is simply allowed to fall as it will over the white satin slip, and the figure is largely depended upon to give the line

The débutante's color, pink, is here relieved only by a touch of green in the satin wound in the pink girdle. The bodice and tunic are of pink chiffon picked out with crystal beads, and through the lower part of the corsage is run a strip of white lace; the sleeves are of pink net, the skirt of pink charmeuse—altogether as charming a frock as any débutante could desire for her summer dances. The back view of the gown in the middle shows a more studied line; the drapery is arranged in a favorite Callot manner, caught high under a gold and pearl buckle like the one at the bust. THE DÉBUTANTE'S TRIAL BY ORDEAL

THE house party is one of the first stepping-stones to a débutante's social success. It is more important than a ball, and almost as valuable as an opera box. Astute mothers, therefore, arrange that their daughters go to these affairs the summer before they make their formal bow to society.

The house party, now Englished into the week-end because it is usually a Friday-to-Monday affair, is a custom borrowed from English society. For a century it was the most important part of social life in our own south, which transplanted its social conventions, full-blown, from London soil. All other entertainments of English life centered about the house party. If balls and routs and card games were to be given in a costly and brilliant manner, they took place when the house was filled with guests. And in those days a house party was not confined to a week-end; they usually lasted for several weeks. The later custom has arisen to meet the exigencies of modern life, in which the men must work that the women may play. As the American man is at leisure during Saturday afternoon and Sunday, a large part of the social good times are arranged so as to include him—whether for his own or the ladies' pleasure is not obvious.

The débutante is usually not so sophisticated as to be aware of all the advantages of the friendly contact with men and women which the house party imposes. The ceremonious society of ballrooms and dinner tables allows small chance for intimacy, and the pressure put upon a débutante during her first season grants her little opportunity for making friends, so she either keeps to those she has made as a schoolgirl, or merely adds a host of new acquaintances. And yet it is necessary for a girl's success that she has what Queed delightfully phrased as "twenty minutes for human intercourse." It is at the house party that the débutante has her best opportunity for closer human intercourse.

THE DÉBUTANTE'S COURT OF PROBATION

A débutante will sometimes, with the approval of her mother, go to house parties given by a hostess of whom she knows too little; she accepts under the plea that she is sure of a jolly time. Now she may argue that she is under no obligation to that hostess, and that she can do as she pleases concerning house invitations; but she can not. When it is known that she will accept any invitation that offers a good time, she will surely receive unkind criticism from those who do not lightly judge the obligation imposed by staying under another's roof. A wise mother will punctiliously guard her daughter against such criticisms.

A house party raises a tumult of anxiety in a young girl's mind, especially if she has not been accustomed to visiting. Even an older person is not quite sure what routine to expect in another's house, and her anxiety is not to be wondered at. She feels more timorous about a week-end than about a ball, because the latter does not last so long, and she knows that if she can dance there is little else to fret about. But a week-end party gives much food for deliberation. There is the hostess and the host with their likes and dislikes; there is the necessity of being tactful and agreeable, and of making oneself a pleasant addition to the gathering; there are the servants to consider—what to do about tips, and the amount of service one can ask.

The Testing of the Débutante Is at Her First House Party, Where, Cut Off From Her Mother's Guardian-Angelship, Her Manners, Personality, and Accomplishments Must Stand On Their Own Merits

Of course, there are débutantes who give no thought to these side issues; they think only of the pleasure of the occasion, and this is perhaps not the worst way out, if they do not carry it to the point of being careless of other people's customs and desires. People may forgive a girl for lapses in politeness, but a hostess does not condone a lack of consideration for her household routine. There are girls whose charm carries them through selfishness, but it is the better policy not to trust to this.

MINDING HER P'S AND Q'S

The recipient of the invitation should begin her good behavior by answering it at once. A hostess naturally dislikes having her invitation neglected, for she wishes to know how to arrange her household during the party, and to attend to a score of details which depend upon the number of guests.

In the old days it was considered the height of ungraciousness for a hostess to suggest to her guests when they should depart; to-day it is not only polite but necessary. It is not possible to leave the question open, and the invited friend does not wish to be left in doubt concerning the time she is expected to leave. Time is precious, appointments are as sea sands, society is run like a business, and the hours for doing things must be known well in advance, or it is impossible to take part in them.

Therefore does the modern hostess depart widely from the custom of olden times, and name the day for her guests to arrive and to depart; also, for their mutual convenience, she indicates the trains they are to take. When a girl answers this invitation she must accept it in detail and not in part; if she does not do so in her note of acceptance, her hostess assumes that she expects to abide by the carefully arranged program.

Under no stress of conditions, save the most inevitable, must the guest break her engagement. It is now permissible not to attend a ball or dance, for which one has accepted, if disinclined on the evening it takes place, for in this case one's absence from a large crowd is unnoticed by the hostess, and it has no effect on her arrangements; but this privilege is not permitted her who is to be a member of a house party, which, at the most, would scarcely include more than a dozen guests. No matter what exciting event may offer during that period of time, she must ignore it and keep to the original engagement. She must not miss the train, for it will be met at the station, and she is excessively inconsiderate, not to say impolite, if she sends word at the last moment that she must be met at another train. These are things which weigh lightly on the minds of many girls, and yet, by ignoring them, they may endanger their chances for further invitations.

The guest must also be careful not to carry too much luggage. It is perhaps even advisable to adopt the English habit of carrying boxes, as they call them; these are not heavy, and they hold a sufficient amount of apparel. These light-weight, convenient, English boxes can now be obtained in America.

It is most unwise for a house guest to inform any friends she may have in the neighborhood that she will be visiting there at a certain time. It should be left to the hostess to ask whomever she wishes to her house, and she should not be forced into a position which might cause her embarrassment. For any one of many good reasons she may find it awkward to entertain such guests. The most the house guest can do is casually to inform her hostess that she has friends in the neighborhood.

ALWAYS SHE MUST BE PLEASED

Whatever else the guest does not do, she must lend herself with enthusiasm to the plans of her hostess; she may inwardly rebel at some of them, but she must smile and give every appearance of enjoyment. There are small house parties at which the hostess knows her guests so intimately that she does not plan for them beyond arranging dinners and luncheons; these are the happiest of all to attend, because no embargo is laid upon the tastes or the hours of the guests, and, left to themselves, they amuse each other with the utmost satisfaction. But the débutante must find out how the plans of her hostess run before she ventures upon freedom of action. Everything may not be to her liking; she may consider the pleasures limited, and the schedule rigid; but her solution of the difficulty lies in the future and not in the present. She need not go any more, but she must behave very nicely while she is there.

There are lazy or busy hostesses who do not appear in the morning, and who allow their guests the same freedom; they expect them to ring for breakfast and order what they wish. But a guest must be very sure that her hostess intends her to do this before she ventures upon such a familiarity.

WHERE IT IS EASY TO ERR

The mistake of many débutantes at house parties is their attitude toward men. No hostess minds harmless flirtations or genuine love affairs, but the girl who flirts too openly and injudiciously, even when innocently, is apt to give anxiety to her hostess, and sometimes to be reluctantly dropped from her list of house friends.

In fact, one of the restrictions of a house party is that no member is free to go her own way, nor to speak out her mind. She must have as good a time as she can within the limits of her hostess's wishes, and with consideration toward a number of equally privileged persons.

A guest has many responsibilities. She must look carefully after trifles which make her presence a pleasure. One of the most important of these is a regard for the servants of the house. The young girl may have been allowed at home to leave her room in disorder; her mother may have neglected that most important element in true ladyhood—neatness. The girl may have been allowed to fling her dresses over chairs and tables, to step out of her clothes and leave them in disordered heaps, to neglect to separate the fresh and the soiled linen, and to leave muddy boots where they do the most harm. These are serious mistakes to make in another's house. One becomes a nuisance to servants, and sadly reflects upon the home training. It is expected of each guest that she should hang up her clothes, put away those she is not using, and show some regard for those who must do her work. No matter how heavily she tips the maids, they do not look upon her kindly if she increases their burdens.

When she departs she must tip each person who has been of service to her, and send something to those she does not see, especially to the cook. If she does not tip all evenly, she should give the major portion to the maid who brings her breakfast and assists her in dressing, and to the maid or man who serves her at table. She must also tip the driver or chauffeur who takes her to and from the station, and the servants who carry her boxes.

There is no set rule for the amount of the tip. One is almost inclined to wish there was. In the fascinating memoirs of the wife of the Danish minister to France, the author tells how the major domo of the royal household presented to each guest, in her room, a bill covering the whole amount of tips expected by the servants. It would save much perturbation if the matter could be thus arranged now, for whatever the hostess says, the servants must be tipped.

W O M A N ' S W A T E R L O O

IN every country, but especially in England, the call of sport has been heard and answered by the modern women, practically irrespective of class. Yet this wave of enthusiasm is by no means to be accepted as the inauguration of a new era of athletic achievement, nor is it yet producing in the sports world a feminine race which meets its mankind on an equal footing. On the contrary, there is already a considerable danger of the sportswoman losing the prestige she has gained; of her being forced to retire into mufti and secret practice with gun and rod, bat and club, owing to the quickly gathering clan of fervent devotees to the uniform, but not to the spirit, of sport.

SUIT THE DRESS TO THE SPORT

In putting forth a plea for a reconsideration of sport apart from fashion, and a protest against wearing the fashions of sport apart from all sporting associations, an appeal is made to what is simply a latent sense of appropriateness; an appreciation of the importance of confining fashions to their proper place. To judge by appearances, this blindness to appropriateness is the direct result of the use of the senseless word "sports" as a prefix. At the present moment something like fifty per cent. of the girls in England are "sports-girls," and their wardrobe is made up in the proportion of two "sports" garments to one of any other kind.

How many of these girls are sportswomen one hardly dares to guess; and the best that can be said in their extenuation is that they themselves have never given a single thought to the matter. They are absolutely innocent of any breach of dress etiquette; they are simply ignorant of its laws.

ERRORS OF COMMISSION

In order to emphasize the errors of commission which are to be noted daily in England, the so-called "home of sport," and which, through the force of bad example, are spreading across seas and continents, one or two by no means uncommon spectacles may be instanced. Since the winter sports of Switzerland have become a healthy craze, as well as an infatuated fashion, the vogue for sports dress has reached England, has invaded its streets, entered its city offices, and penetrated its West

When Any But the True Sportswoman Attempts to Meet Man on the Field of Sports, She Is, As Far as Dressing Properly Goes, Hopelessly Routed

London pleasure resorts. Any day last winter one may have met the bob-sleigh girl in her sports coat, with her neck snugly wound with a woolly sports scarf, and a knitted cap drawn well down over her ears; a peep of a fleecy sports waistcoat suggested the final precaution against the chilly air of the motor omnibus in which she was riding. This "sports-girl" was as entirely and mercifully unconscious of her extraordinary surroundings as of the intrusive appearance of her Dorothy bag, her impossible, low-cut pumps, and her transparent stockings.

THE AVIATION COSTUME FOR SHOPPING

Shopping in the airless zones of feminine fashion one met the "lady aviator," clad in knitted wear, complete up to her aviation cap, and intent on ascending in nothing more dangerous than a bargain-sale lift. She is merely wearing the uniform of the aerodrome because it has been pressed into service among the sports fashions; her costume stamps her as possibly an innocent, but none the less exasperating, impostor.

Not very long ago a meeting was held with the object of forming a league for the prevention of the slaughter of all furred and feathered things. Incredible as it may appear, there was no outcry at the presence at this humane gathering of several women in full shooting sports costume, minus only the gun!

THE SIMPLE GUIDING RULE

These are facts which mean one of two things. Either women are determined to wear the badge of sports without possessing the remotest claim to be associated with them, or they are the victims of an absurd and misguided vagary of fashion. It is more than probable that the greater proportion of those who wear sports fashions have not yet realized their transgression, nor the fact that they are destroying the very charm that sporting dress, and not "sports" garments, should possess for their sex.

The rule which should override temptation in this respect is simple enough; the woman must justify the clothes she wears by her pursuits, or at least by her surroundings. Already there is heard a strong protest against women dressing for the sports of which they are merely spectators—a pretty compliment, but a most unwarrantable liberty, some say.

The question now is: in what way is a woman to discriminate between sports garments which may be justifiably worn and those which may not? Of course, the ingenious inventor of sports novelties has, in a large measure, succeeded in transforming both the utility and the appearance of the fearsome specialties he designs. But certain standards have been established, and the true sportswoman will adopt only those which have been originated because of their particular suitability to a given sport.

ADDING PRETENCE TO INCONGRUITY

And even if some part of these possessions must be worn, why must their inappropriateness and incongruity be heightened by making their pretence doubly apparent? Why should the ubiquitous "leather" button be made of paper pulp and celluloid, or the spat be gummed permanently upon the high-heeled, patent-leather boot? Why must every coat which should have three plaits be enriched by six, and pockets be unnecessarily multiplied to emphasize the reason for their being? These and many other details of sports dress have been much travestied, but unless commonsense and moderation step in we are not yet within sight of the final goal of good taste.

The end is inevitable. Already, so far as English society is concerned, the woman, after whose appearance the shop-labeled sports-girl is mis-modeled, is beginning to disentangle herself from this morass of sartorial uncertainty. Whereas she once permitted herself some latitude where her town and country fashions were concerned, she has now felt obliged to mark the distinction unmistakably. Indeed, as sports fashions increasingly invade the city, their more striking and individual characteristics are assumed less and less by those who really make use of them in their country life.

CHESTERFIELD JUNIOR.

WHEN VIRGINIA DANCES

DURING the past decade the play-houses have been flooded with dancers, for dancing has risen once more to a position beside the other arts. A dancer is looked upon as an artist, as in the time of the Hellenes.

Virginia Myers is a child of the century. Already, at the age of six, she is a dancer of note. Her father is Jerome Myers, whose paintings of the East Side have made him famous; her mother, Ethel Myers, is one of the most individual of our sculptors. Virginia is, therefore, an artist by heritage, and she lives rather the life of an artist than of a child. Her days are spent in a big studio at Carnegie Hall, and she knows few children. Possibly, though she can understand little of the discussions on the arts that are constantly waged in her home, she drinks in something of their spirit, and thus is gently urged along the path of self-expression. When she was four she had already danced before a fashionable audience at the Plaza and found fault with the conducting of Naham Franko. Later, Chalif, who instructs instructors of dancing, had the little girl dance before his classes, for he believed they might learn from her some of the spontaneity that is the surest sign of genius. And if they did not learn, it was not Virginia's fault.

Since then there have been numberless dances at the Carnegie Hall studio, and these have been attended by the literary, artistic, and fashionable people of New York society. The studio eventually became too small to hold the crowds of people who requested permission to see Virginia dance, and so her parents decided upon an almost public performance. This was given by subscription at the Berkeley Theatre, and was a genuine success. The music was rendered by Alois Truka, the violinist, and Miss Florence Beckwith, the pianist. Virginia danced to selections from Bach, Beethoven, Elgar, Kreisler, Chopin, Dittersdorf, Dvorák, Sinding, Wieniawski, and Cui. Not one of the pieces was familiar to her; she had never danced on that stage before; she had not had a moment of rehearsal; yet, before the pale blue draperies which Isadora Duncan uses as a drop curtain, and which the artist's manager had lent for the occasion, Virginia danced, quite unconscious of her audience, to the musical emotions of the great composers, moving quickly from joy to sorrow, from comedy to tragedy. The tiny figure filled the stage with the pure force of her personality, moving with a daring that is rare even in experienced professionals. Indeed, it is a question if the child is not as professional in her manner as any of the dancers of the day. No unfortunate accident, and there were not a few that day, interrupted the rhythmic swing of her dancing; she was superior to numberless encores, and unabashed by gifts of flowers that would have turned any other child's head. But then Virginia, dancing, is not like any other child.

This Year the Horse Has Come Into His Own, Attaining a Popularity Almost Equal to That of Pre-Motor Days—Is America Going Dry?

HAIL to the Horse! Again he has come into his own! Polo, pony races, hunt meets, amateur steeple-chases, horse shows in the open—where they should be—are succeeding one another rapidly, most of them at Long Island, for to-day that is the shire country of America. It is here that society assembles from early May until Christmas to indulge in those outdoor pleasures in which the horse figures so largely.

Almost any intelligent person can master those outdoor sports which are concerned merely with inanimate golf balls and long-handled clubs, or the simple paraphernalia of the tennis court, but it takes ginger and blood to ride. Once a horseman, always a horseman! But it is the attainment of that "once" that is so difficult. Masters of horses are born, not made. No matter what experiences of life may intervene between a horseback rider and the opportunity to indulge his favorite sport, he never loses the ability to control a fiery mount. Good horsemanship is a quality in many respects like that atmosphere of aristocracy which is a part of the well-born, and which is never lost, no matter in what alien currents of life circumstances may throw them.

This coming season there is to be polo at Newport, polo, as usual, at Naragansett, at Southampton, and even, it is said, at Bar Harbor. In the Tuxedo Hills, in the flat pine lands of Lakewood, in the rolling country in Westchester, and in the settlements along the seashore, it is the same story. We are returning to the pre-motor régime.

AN AMERICAN M. F. H. IN ENGLAND

Indeed, so strong has this spirit waxed, so wise have we become in horse-knowledge, that we are able to give points to England. That country has lately—God save the mark!—come to America for an M. F. H. for one of her historic packs—Mr. R. E. Strawbridge, who has been made master of the Cottesmore hounds. It must be granted that the English sporting press has been most amiable about it. Naturally, in Mr. Strawbridge, it can not but recognize one of the best riders to hounds in the country, even if it can not help shedding a few pardonable tears over the fact that Uncle Sam has come and conquered the hunting field, one of the most precious of English possessions. It generously classes Mr. Strawbridge as a "good sport," even if in its human heart there may be the tiniest soupçon of a grudge.

WHAT THE HORSE WILL DO FOR US

This revival of interest in the horse is sure to have most happy effects. The horse induces sociability. In country places where there are few opportunities for seeing one's neighbors, he is the means of bringing people together. The meets of hounds, the racing, the polo at the country clubs, and the neighborhood horse shows make most hospitable and lively centers of interest.

This outdoor life with the horse will also have its influence on manners, customs, and even fashions. We were wont in the past to decry the stable, and to deplore the coarseness of those who found amusement there. Naturally, the conversation of grooms, hostlers, and coachmen was not uplifting, but with all their drawbacks, there was in these men (and those of higher rank who had common interest with them) a species of honesty and frankness that we would do well to adopt. There is still another virtue which we may expect the horse to effect in society. As polo demands a sure hand and a clear head, temperance will thereby obviously be promoted.

VIVE LE CHEVAL!

The mere masculine mind is not capable of prophesying the turn fashion may take, in response to the call to the open, but it (the masculine mind) being open and progressive (at least we so fondly hope), will note with interest the mandates that may be issued from the throne of Madame la Mode.

We believe that the horse, once apparently in danger of being obliterated from our civilization, is now reasonably secure from the awful fate of being known to future generations only by stuffed specimens in museums of natural history. Vive le cheval!

IN LIGHTER VEIN

Having paid our respects to the horse—a subject very near and dear to our hearts—we may now turn to lighter themes. The question of what we shall drink and wherewithal we shall be fed has claimed large share of attention lately. England, for instance, is much agitated over the grapefruit. It is only fair to the tight little island to say that though she may, by force of circumstances, have been impelled to import an American M. F. H., and even to let some of her choicest shootings to Americans, she is by no means prepared to adopt our habits and customs in other matters. She can not be led, she can not be driven to Americanisms, and grapefruit is an Americanism. Long and obstinately has she withstood its enticements, and now she is making one last, firm stand. Definitely she rejects the grapefruit. Specialized ability and dollars may achieve certain victories, but her breakfast table, last ditch of English conservatism, is not to be invaded by the irreverent colonist. The Englishman eats bacon and eggs three hundred and sixty-five mornings in the year, and welcomes leap year because it enables him to indulge in that delightful dish three hundred and sixty-six times. Down with innovations!

Strange to say, France has taken to the grapefruit, and it is quite à la mode in Paris, where they are also eating American breakfast foods. I wonder if they will break their hundred-year traditions and serve them with their crescent-shaped roll and chicory coffee. I believe they are using the grapefruit now at the regular déjeuner, and that they are giving the children the breakfast foods.

SPEAKING OF DRINKS

Then on the question of drinks. America is much stirred on that subject at present; so much so, indeed, as to have attracted international comment. I said recently that I should consider it a mistake if, at the White House, there should be an absolute taboo on wines. I am not a drinker myself. Once in a while I like a glass of champagne, and I am supposed to be an excellent judge of vintages; but I hail the spirit of temperance which prevails in society to-day, in many of the larger clubs, and among men of affairs. There is much less drinking than ever before; there is very little between meals, and often none at all until evening. But there is no reason why this pleasure should not be gently indulged in by those who enjoy it.

WINELESS DINNERS

Some of our friends have gone to the other extreme. There have been several large dances this winter—preceded by dinners and followed by elaborate suppers—at which not a drop of wine has been served. In its place came fizzy waters, which were opened with much gusto and popping of corks, and—last hypocrisy of all—they were in bottles concealed by napkins. I do not know whether this was to deceive a bit, as vegetarians sometimes do with their mock cutlets and imitation roasts, but however much there may be in mental suggestion and hypnotism, it certainly does not embrace drinks. The ability to drink the most sparkling table waters—delicious and refreshing in their way—and to imagine that it is the juice of the grape is not granted to man.

The NAME PLACE of a FAMOUS WOMAN

THE Château de Maintenon is one of the most interesting of the many famous castles of France, not alone because of its historic associations, but for the beauty of its architecture, and the unique loveliness of its wooded parks. Its history dates from the earliest Gothic times, and its architecture is a splendid example of the massive masonry of the earlier periods combined with the more ornate decorations of the Renaissance. For many years it was the property of Jean Cottereau, that skilful treasurer of four successive kings—Louis XI, Charles VIII, Louis XII, and Francis I—whose shield and crest, found upon many doors and arches, indicate the additions made under his direction. Toward the middle of the seventeenth century it was purchased by Louis XIV from a certain marquis de Villeray, and shortly afterward Madame Scarron, governess to the king's children, bought the estate. When she came into favor she had the satisfaction of having her place at Maintenon raised to a marquise, and herself entitled Madame de Maintenon. It has remained in her family ever since.

A MEDIEVAL CASTLE

It is a magnificent old building of stone and brick, with a high, pinnacled, Renaissance roof of slate, and graceful, fluted stone chimneys. The main façade is built in a rather curious manner so as to form a wall between the outer entrance court and the inner court of honor, the entrance to which is through a beautiful arched doorway of the Louis XIV epoch. At each end of the main façade on the court of honor side are two brick towers, one red and one white, with battlements and turrets still intact. These impart to the château a formidable medieval air.

To the right is a long, straight wing running the entire length of one side of the outer

Among them is the portrait of the one-time chatelaine and of her niece, Mademoiselle d'Aubigné, to whom Madame de Maintenon presented the château upon the young girl's marriage to the son of the maréchal de

Noailles, of that illustrious family of admirals, cardinals, marshals, and litterateurs, who have played such distinguished parts in the affairs of the French nation. A wonderfully beautiful old room it is, with its richly colored and gilded woodwork and its Renaissance ceiling, mellowed with age. Stately Louis XIV chairs and sofas, upholstered in

A SECOND MOTHERHOOD

AT present women are seeking self-expression quite outside the sphere which convention formerly allotted to them. Middle-aged American mothers are demanding interests to take the place of the children who have grown out of their care. It is just in the prime of his life that the father becomes a man with the most absorbing interests, but, contrariwise, it is just in the prime of her life that the mother becomes a woman with empty hands.

THERE could be no better training for the consideration of public questions, great and small, than that which is the common experience of every thoughtful mother. The solving of the simplest problems of childhood involves deliberation of a truly judicial character, and countless times a mother acts and re-acts the parts of both judge and jury, of legal adviser, and of opposing counsel. The knowledge gained from this kind of experience is a far too valuable asset to be allowed, as it usually is, to fall into disuse just when it has touched its highest value—when the children have become men and women. The ways in which it may be applied for the public weal and for the mother's are many, but here we wish to call attention to only one—a rather unusual field of activity and one with which only the very few would even come into contact.

IN one way or another, by a few months' residence during the summer, by their proximity to a country estate, by motoring through them, perhaps, many women have become acquainted with the decadent small towns which exist in all parts of our country; and the question of how to resuscitate these little places has almost surely grazed their minds. It is a problem of no little importance, and one which these same women of whom we have been speaking would be not only free, but peculiarly well suited to help solve, for the knowledge gained from parenthood is particularly applicable to the solution of the many problems which concern these decadent towns, where the conditions may be met only by a sort of individual settlement work.

THE village is practically free from the economic questions which confront the metropolis, but it is victimized by a moral and intellectual disease which the northern man calls laziness, and which, dodging behind the mercury, the man born south of the Mason and Dixon line excuses as a climatic languor. The influences which contribute to the non-progressiveness of the small town are the lethargic habits of the untraveled older generation with its horizon bounded by its yesterdays, the wayward tendencies of the younger generation which, through lack of food for imagination, has turned its meager pleasures into lawlessness, and the draining of the best blood of the village for the cities.

THESE two phases of human nature, the one moss-grown with prejudice, the other entrenched behind the insolence of undisciplined youth, may be dealt with only by a reformer who is willing to make haste slowly. Her efforts may not, as in the city, be frankly heralded by the organization of a Higher Thought Society or a Rescuer's League, and they must, above all, be most tactful—must be slipped in like a delicate suggestion to stick like a profound conviction. In every small town there is at least one influential, broad-minded woman who would be willing to cooperate with the summer resident of a nearby estate in improving the local conditions.

THE young people should be the objective, of course, and in their behalf an outsider may always interest herself without appearing to be officious. It is possible for her to supplement the restricted curriculum of the village school by specialized classes held under the auspices of young people's clubs. She may also help to furnish it with copies of famous paintings and sculptures. Although it is now not at all uncommon for the small town to boast a library, it is a very rare thing, indeed, to find it properly supervised. In any library there are many good books which are undoubtedly bad books when submitted to the perusal of school children. Yet, in the small library, there is seldom any one present who will help school children in making a proper choice from the open shelves. The woman of discriminating taste who has had experience with children, and who is willing to give her services in the distribution of books from such a library, will be a great factor in molding the tendencies of the next generation. These suggestions are given only as an intimation of a field of service which lies fallow while the talents of many capable, keen-witted women, which might be increased twofold by active social service, are allowed to deteriorate through disuse.

A GLIMPSE THROUGH A GARDEN GATE

SURELY it can be no difficult matter to create a garden-party frock in the spring. Ideas for these lovely outdoor garments must quicken spontaneously at this inspirational season; surely a gown must come as naturally to the designer as a spring ode to the poet. One can imagine Poiret, for instance, strolling about his garden, pausing near a parterre of flowers to make a few notes—a theme for a material, a trimming, or a color combination—and dispatching them to his Paris atelier, from whence they presently emerge in the form of a garden-party frock. And arguing from this pretty hypothesis, we might guess that the frock of silk crêpe sketched first on this page was inspired by a rose, for the whole dress is of that shade, and the conventionalized flower figures the girdle and cuffs. The skirt is gathered below the knees into a narrow panel of self-material which is trimmed with rows of crêpe buttons embroidered with small, blue flowers. Similar buttons trim the deep yoke of the bodice, which has a white crêpe collar embroidered with pink roses and blue leaves. The sleeves are finished with button-trimmed bands, from which hang plaited, pink crêpe frills. The wide belt which extends far over the hips, giving a very long effect to the waist, is of white silk crêpe, striped with diagonal lines of blue floss and embroidered in pink roses to match the collar. The cap, in a fine, ashes-of-roses straw, is trimmed with a fancifully woven, silk-braid band which hangs over the side in a fringed end. Two small, silk roses, that reflect colors of the gown, are placed at the right of the closely fitted brim.

Another garden-party frock by Poiret is

The Garden Party Frock, to Be Truly Effective, Must So Reflect Its Surroundings As to Seem a Part of Its Setting sketched at the right on this page. It is of white silk crêpe finely striped in clusters with red, white, and blue lines, and patterned in red and green Poiret roses. The skirt, like the one shown in the first sketch, is slightly shorter in front than at the sides or back, and is bordered with a band of green silk crêpe piped with white, which is drawn at the front into a huge bow. The green crêpe jacket, which has a white net yoke and a narrow belt of green silk, closes at the waist-line under a similar bow. Three tiny frills of white net finish the neck, and net frills finish the long sleeves and hang over the hands. Bronze silk stockings and bronze slippers are worn with this frock. Also with this costume is shown a charming chapeau of white straw trimmed with a garland of green silk leaves.

TWO SUMMERY GARDEN GOWNS

The Martial et Armand frock shown in the second drawing on the page is of faille silk in a foliage-green shade. A long strip of the silk is swathed about the figure so that one end—the bottom of which is widely embroidered in vivid shades of floss—comes to the middle of the front, where it forms a broad box-plait. The draping of the material on each side of this plait is caught under the edges of the plait. The upper portion of the skirt forms a slight pannier, which is rather short at the front, but drops quite low at the back. Above a white satin girdle which fastens under a bow at the back is a bodice of green chiffon underlaid with white. The white chiffon fronts are trimmed with rhinestone buttons, and the neck is finished with a high frill of white lace which, at the bust, forms a pointed revers. Pointed cuffs of white chiffon garnished with a row of rhinestone buttons band the elbow sleeves, and are finished with frills of lace. A small, green straw hat, trimmed with green and white shaded plumes is to be worn with this gown, and a green sunshade lined with white chiffon completes the costume—altogether a most cool and becoming summery frock for a garden-party occasion.

Purple silk crêpe of the thinnest and finest weave patterned with bright red flowers is used by Dumay for the matronly garden-party gown shown third on the page. At the knees the tunic is bordered with a band of plain purple chiffon which rises in the back into a V insert. The underskirt of the costume is of several layers of purple chiffon mounted upon self-toned China silk. At the waist-line the tunic is drawn in by a narrow belt of soft, purple silk, from which fall purple chiffon sash-ends finished with silk tassels. The lower part of the flowered crêpe corselet is veiled with chiffon and is cut in front in two points, and in back in a curved panel. The flowered crêpe meets a yoke of purple chiffon which is finished about the neck with a fine, Venetian lace collar. The puffed sleeves of purple chiffon over figured crêpe drop below the elbow, where the fulness is caught in under a purple, tassel-finished cording.

AN ELABORATE GOWN FOR THE DÉBUTANTE

A débutante who fancies rather elaborate garden-party frocks has ordered the pink and white Lanvin model shown at the bottom of this page. The skirt, of a youthful shade of pink taffeta, is caught into folds at the middle of the front, and is veiled to the knees by an overskirt of white net which is fulled to the waist-band and finished at the lower edge with a stiff pink taffeta ruche which makes it stand away from the figure. A festoon of rose-tinted pansies and forget-me-nots trails down the overskirt and is caught to the corselet in a cluster. Folds of white net, veiling pink taffeta, cross the shoulders, and pass under the corselet, which, at the back, forms a butterfly bow centered by a long buckle. A horizontal band of white net, veiling pink chiffon, extends across the top of the corselet in front and overlaps a plain net guimpe. A pink taffeta ruche edges the ruffles of the puffed sleeves, and a narrow net frill finishes the bodice at the waist-line. A hat of white net wreathed with a garland of variegated flowers has been designed to wear with this costume.

A SMOKE-GRAY GOWN

The Agnes model of smoke-gray satin shown in the second illustration on this page is particularly charming. The skirt of meteor satin, slit at both sides, slightly draped, and trimmed with a row of gray satin ball-buttons, is partly veiled by a tunic of gray chiffon bordered with gray lace. Down the middle of the front runs a chiffon panel, and at the back, over the tunic, hangs a long panel of chiffon the lace border of which crosses the gray satin girdle, and forms two short tabs. A gray chiffon-veiled satin corselet runs to a sharp point high at the front of the bodice. The transparent net guimpe is finished square at the front, and in a V at the back. Cuffs of double layers of chiffon finish the elbow sleeves. A deep yellow rose at the corsage gives a dash of color to the costume. The hat worn with this gown is of gray net, which makes a harmonious whole.

The gown shown next was designed for the matronly figure. A slash up the back of an underskirt of deep blue brocaded crêpe satin makes a graceful walk possible. In front the pannier is draped up beneath a point insert of white Venise lace which falls below a girdle, the front half of which is of white satin trimmed with a bow and two buttons of self-material; the back part is of blue satin. Two long sash-ends of blue satin ribbon fall from the girdle in back, and outline the parting of the pannier. The two strips of white Venise lace, of which the front insert is the continuation, cross the shoulders, and extend down the back of the white chiffon bodice. At the front of the bodice is a blue satin plastron which partly covers a high corselet of blue chiffon; at the back this plastron is narrow enough to show a fine line of white chiffon at either side. The sleeves of white chiffon hang in deep points at the inner side of the arm, and are caught back at the upper side under three white satin buttons.

GARDEN-PARTY WRAPS

A really practical three-quarter coat has been designed for wear with the last gown sketched. It is of deep blue brocaded crêpe trimmed rather elaborately with self-pipings which are put on in clustered rows down the fronts, and across the sides and back. About the waist-line at the back the pipings form a row of tiny loops. They also trim the sleeves from wrist to elbow, and decorate the velvet collar, which stands high at the back and rolls low at the front. At the outer side seams the material is caught up near the waist to form a slightly draped effect, and from the same seams at the inner side of the garment start silk, tasseled cords which draw the fronts of the coat together without actually closing them.

A distinctly novel garden-party wrap, and one which is quite a fad of the summer, is a huge square of brocaded crêpe with no slits for the arms and no defined neck. It is to be simply swathed about the figure.

Many times when it is too warm even for a coat there seems to be a real necessity for some slight wrap over the filmy afternoon gown. In fact, the mode for transparent, low-bodiced, day-time frocks has translated the scarf from the class of a pretty accessory into that of an intrinsic part of the garden-party costume. The couturiers, realizing this, have decided that it is wise to take the designing of scarfs into their own hands, and to make them in colors and materials matching or blending with the gowns with which they are to be worn. Notable among the large houses which are following this policy is that of Béchoff-David. His scarfs are made of chiffons in plain colors, and are trimmed at either end with eighteen-inch bands of self-tone satin. Such scarfs may be charmingly worn wound about the arms or throat in Queen Louise fashion, or allowed to fall so as half to conceal one shoulder. A scarf worn in this way does not detract at all from the lines of the gown with which it is worn, but rather resolves itself into a sort of additional drapery.

Lewis has designed in cream crêpe, patterned in flowers red and green, a charming trio of hat, scarf, and parasol. Several little originalities mark the hat—an inward-turning plaiting of black taffeta on the brim, a tight crown of the printed crêpe, and a feather fantasy caught with roses. Scarf and inconsequential parasol are margined with black, plaited taffeta, and the latter, finely cross-barred in black, has a glowing border of roses woven in wool

That grace imparted by a large, floppy hat is most suited to the bridesmaid. This Jeanne Lanvin model is of gray straw covered with plaited tulle ruffles under which runs a gray-blue ribbon streamer; a pink rose weights the brim

However simple the dress, such a coat and hat would bestow upon it something of the picturesque. The coat, which is little more than a bolero in front, is of maroon pompadour silk figured with roses deeply red, and outlined with a plaiting of black lace which turns back from the edge. Three small bows in French-blue tie it in front. The black tulle hat has not only great width, but also unusual height, achieved by big, stiff tulle bows

Evelyn Varon here claims no originality of color, but lays stress on an altogether unique contour achieved by catching up the back of the soft leghorn brim with a broad band of French-blue velvet, caught under pink roses, that passes around the crown to the front of the brim

WITHIN A GARDEN WALL

SO much has been written about the indoor home life of England, extolling the cheer and comfort of closely drawn curtains, a roaring fire, and a tea-table hospitably loaded with a tea-service, toast, muffins, and darkly rich plum cake, that this has come to be a generally accepted picture of English domesticity. This is, however, a somewhat stereotyped setting, and has been overemphasized to the disparagement of other phases of British life; for although the English have been singularly successful in creating an atmosphere of good cheer within doors, they have been no less happy in their achievements outdoors, and have invariably extended an atmosphere of comfort and content to the furthestmost limits of their "earthly" possessions.

THE ENGLISHMAN'S CASTLE

The primary reason for this most satisfactory condition of affairs is the Britisher's insistence upon absolute privacy. The Englishman's home is his castle, and this home includes his garden, which he wishes to make just as intimate and personal as his house. To accomplish this he surrounds it with either a high wall or a massive hedge. Prying neighbors, village bores, and mischievous boys are thus held at bay, and every man's "bit o' ground" becomes as distinctive as his drawing-room, because he cultivates it with a view to individual taste and need, rather than with the idea of producing an effect upon the passer-by or of making it in harmony with his neighbors' gardens. It matters not whether the garden is part of a vast estate, or merely the tiny plot attached to a week-end cottage, it will be sure to have an atmosphere of pleasant seclusion that suggests the frequent presence of happy people who come there to enjoy its healthy calm.

A house which seems to turn a cold and forbidding face upon the village street, in many instances has a walled garden at the rear that is ablaze with warm and brilliant colors, and it is generally but a step from the long, French windows of the drawing-room to the green velvet of the lawn, where roomy wicker chairs, piled high with gay chintz cushions, invite to repose amid the perfume of the roses.

Individuality asserts itself strongly in the English garden. Here each and every member of the family delights to exercise some special preference or fad. In one garden, a corner may be consecrated to the iris, in another flames an herbaceous border, while a third is distinguished by the latest craze in rock-gardening. If there are children, they are sure to clamor for a piece of the family playground where they may erect a hutch for their beloved bunnies, or dig a miniature lake for a brood of ducklings.

SIMPLE GARDEN PLEASURES

In the walled garden it is possible to entertain, for there is the same feeling of ease and security as is experienced in a room where the curtains are drawn. The English people are not spectacular, and above all else they abhor unnecessary and vulgar display. A garden, however beautiful, would not appeal to them unless it was protected from publicity and intrusion. They regard it as an outdoor room where they can live as composedly as in the house.

If the garden is large enough, a tennis court is sure to be laid out, for this is the game of games of British youth. Croquet, too, is popular in England, and the game in all its scientific detail is played with extreme concentration by the older and quieter members of the family. After the matches are over, tea is always served, the treasures of the garden are displayed with pride, flower seeds are gravely exchanged, and much advice is bestowed regarding the ills of pets, and the habits and peculiarities of plants. Very simple and peaceful is the life within these walled gardens, so securely shut in against noise, dust, and the distracting influence of the street, for here no one tries to outdo his neighbor either in dress or the scale of entertainment.

Though the black charmeuse of this Agnes model might seem a bit somber for summer wear, it is lightened by a lavish use of white lace. To tone the elaborate skirt to a befitting simplicity the waist is made of white chiffon, plain save for an insert of lace back and front and on each sleeve

THE NICE DISTINCTION BETWEEN
SUMMER AND WINTER EVENING GOWNS
MUST BE ONLY THE MORE RIGIDLY
OBSERVED BECAUSE IT IS SO FINE

It is a tendency of the season to cut the bodices of evening gowns, however low in front, unusually high in back. This view of the gown shown above on the right displays, likewise, a unique substitute for the sash—a double jabot of lace

A summer evening gown is a very different thing from a winter evening gown. True, they may both be of charmeuse, brocade, satin, what you will, and trimmed with lace, beads, or even fur, but still there is a distinction, none the less obligatory because so subtle. It is a question of quantities rather than of qualities. Here brocaded charmeuse is draped into a skirt, and chiffon into a bodice. The bodice is beaded. So far it might be a midwinter garment, but it is in the reserve with which the beads are used that we recognize its summer character. A Rondeau model

Just to do the simplest, one might almost say, the most obvious thing, that is the way to create a style that shall fit youth like a glove. Here is no striving for the unusual—just simple, almost commonplace lines raised to distinction by the material (white taffeta), and by the embroidery in wools of Dresden tones on the wide band, outlined by a quilling of taffeta, that borders the wrap

Something as elusive as itself must be used to interpret the spirit of girlhood—shadow lace, let us say, and delicate net—these have been utilized by the artist, Gerbault, for this gown shown at the first exhibition of costumes designed by French painters of women's portraits, and displayed at the Maison Bulloz. SEEN in the SHOPS

IT is the custom of the shops to hint to us in January of what will be worn in June, and to confirm their insinuations in April with the most delightful clothes, both for the first warm days and for midsummer. May is the summer harvest month of the shops. Then it is that the prettiest and freshest models are shown, and so beguiling is the array that the wisdom of the serpent is required in making wise selections.

THE SEPARATE WAIST AND SKIRT

An essential of every wardrobe is the separate waist. The tub dress is a pronounced mode, to be sure, but there are times when nothing will replace the separate waist. This season waists are shown in distinctive styles, as charming as they are different from those of other years. The one sketched on this page has an especially becoming neck-line—the great secret of a successful blouse. It is made of an excellent quality of white voile, and the collar, cuffs, yoke, and armhole are outlined with ajour stitching. Crocheted buttons and a black silk tie are the only trimming. Price, $5.

The skirt shown with the blouse described is a four-gored model of white éponge buttoned its whole length a trifle to the left side. A handkerchief or even a golf or tennis ball may find a place in the patch pocket on the right side. The back is laid in two tucks stitched to the knee. This makes the skirt a really comfortable one for walking or sports, and yet it is straight enough to give a slender silhouette. From a mass of separate skirts and blouses these were selected because they represent a conservative style which is a specialty of a certain Fifth Avenue shop. Price, $4.95.

Another practical, white voile waist has the front and back laid in clusters of fine tucks, with the closing at the center-front. A pointed collar, which extends to the shoulder, shows a pretty design of French knots in coral floss. The three-quarter length sleeves have a wide, turnback cuff also trimmed with the French knots. Price, $4.50.

NET BLOUSES AND THEIR UNDERWAISTS

The more transparent the blouse the more surely is it of this season. But such a style requires the exercise of taste and discretion both in the choosing of the blouse and in its wearing. A blouse which would be charming for informal afternoon wear is sketched at the top of page 46. It is entirely of net, and is very simply made. Both the fronts and the back are accordion plaited and joined to a square yoke by ajour stitching. The general daintiness of the model is accentuated by oval pearl buttons which, joined by brides, make a most attractive link closing. The collar and cuffs are finished with embroidered scalloping. Such a waist will launder excellently, as the plaits may easily be pressed in place. Price, $7.95.

Owing to the transparency of the spring blouses, the most delightful little underwaists have made their appearance. Some of the first French models were in vivid colors, but now the more practical ones of white net and handkerchief linen trimmed with colored ribbon are finding more general favor. The one sketched at the right of the net blouse is of white net, which is laid in groups of tucks. Its buttons invisibly at the back. The shoulder straps and the band that passes through the casing at the top of the waist are of ribbon. This is a pretty little garment for wear with summer gowns as well as with transparent blouses. The price is $1.95.

THE ACCOMMODATING SEPARATE COATEE

There is something Dolly Vardenish about the coats which are being worn with summer frocks. Like the chiffon scarfs which women declare "just warm enough," these airy little jackets give some warmth, but they are chiefly intended as an adornment. They are to be had in lace, brocaded silk crêpe, and cotton crêpe, and although they vary somewhat in style, they are usually cut away in the front and are a trifle more than hip length at the back and sides. Light-weight cotton crêpe with little bunches of roses scattered over a white ground is used for the one sketched on this page. The collar and cuffs are of plain white crêpe with a hemstitched edge. A broad, black velvet sash gives a definite note of contrast. Just to be in keeping with the whole piquant style of this little garment, the buttons, instead of appearing on the front of the jacket, are dropped unexpectedly on one side of the sash-end. With a lingerie or cotton crêpe gown this jacket would be especially charming and effective. The price is $14.50.

THE FORMAL COAT

Although of much the same cut, the little coat illustrated on page 46 is rather more formal in appearance. It is made of a brocaded silk crêpe, and in a paprika or carrot shade it would add a very charming note to a garden-party costume. For those who prefer it, the model may be ordered in one of several shades of blue—from a clear, bright blue to a dull gray-blue. It may be had also in black and white, and in any case it is relieved by the double collars of shadow lace which are cut in points on the shoulders. Older women will find this model in black an excellent one for wear with plain, black net or lace dresses. The lines are good, and the belt, being of the same material, avoids a break at the waist-line. Price, $17.50.

BLANDISHMENTS OF THE LACE GOWN

Perhaps the greatest charm of the shadow lace gowns is their essential femininity which is in pleasant contrast to the mannishness of the season's sports and tailored clothes. This contrast in the summer modes is especially noticeable in the upstanding frills which adorn the necks of so many of the afternoon gowns, and the deep lace ruffles which finish the sleeves—quite the antithesis of the severe lines of morning clothes.

The three-flounced gown sketched at the top of page 45 is made of the most delicate shadow lace over a sheer net foundation. The surplice waist is trimmed only by a broad girdle and sash of blue brocade. The girdle is caught at one side with a chrysanthemum of shaded colors. Although by no means too full, the skirt has an unusual amount of fullness given by the shirring which attaches each ruffle to the net foundation. The materials in this gown and the workmanship are excellent. It is decidedly reasonable at $32.50. It could be appropriately worn as a summer dancing frock or for a garden-party or class-day dress. Worn with a white instead of a colored sash, it would be correct for a graduation gown.

A similar dress of shadow lace in a different pattern is made with a four-flounced skirt, and a narrower sash finished in a butterfly bow in the back. Price, $29.50.

THIS SEASON'S BATHING SUITS

The creation of a really smart bathing suit is an achievement which as yet the majority of the shops have not accomplished. Among the many models that are to be found very few are really good. The one illustrated on this page is from a Fifth Avenue shop which is showing some quite distinctive models. Both silk and silk-and-cotton moire are materials which have only recently been used for bathing suits, but they bid fair to become very popular. The silk moire used for this suit is of the best quality, and has sufficient body to make a plain style attractive—yet it is supple enough not to be clumsy. The trimming is distinctly new. The collar, cuffs, and front panel are of white grosgrain silk embroidered in black wool, which gives a brocaded or éponge effect that is far more fitting for a bathing suit than a lace trimming, and is a pleasant change from the plain silk or cotton collar. Although this is not an inexpensive suit, the materials, cut, and finish insure not only good style, but durability. Price, $24.

Here silk moire, which but recently made its bow as a bathing-suit material, is trimmed with embroidered silk. Price, $24

Very good value indeed for a one-season bathing suit may be had in the model shown on page 53. It is of mercerized black moire with a vest and collar of white, ribbed silk. The materials are of a medium grade, but the general style is excellent, and the suit sells for the exceptionally moderate price of $9.75.

THE BARGAINS OF EARLY SUMMER

The big shops which make especially attractive garments for their white sales in the early part of the season frequently offer real bargains which can not be duplicated at other seasons.

A hand-made French chemise for wear with evening gowns is made with a straight top and shoulder straps of ribbon. The upper part is of German Valenciennes lace set between rows of hand-run tucks. The lace-edged upper row forms a casing, through which a ribbon is run. Price, $4.50.

A novel nightgown is made of sheer, white nainsook with the square neck outlined by a very fine écreu batiste in a particularly delicate pattern. Pink bows trim each side of the front, and the little, short sleeves, which suggest a kimono cut, are made of the batiste. Price, $3.

A nightgown of sheer, white nainsook, which will appeal to the woman who likes lacy lingerie, is made with a transparent top of alternate rows of inch-and-a-half Valenciennes lace and fine Swiss embroidery. The top of the gown is finished by a Valenciennes galloon scalloped at the upper edge, and set into the yoke in points at the lower edge. Just below the scalloped edge, narrow ribbon is run through a casing made by applying beading to the wrong side. The lower edge of the yoke, which is in a pretty Empire depth, is finished by three-quarter-inch, Swiss beading run with satin ribbon. The short, bell sleeves are inset rather lavishly with lace, and are finished by the galloon edging. This gown is particularly dainty. Price, $5.

THE TRANSPARENT PETTICOAT

The transparency of the present modes now extends even to petticoats, and the novelty of the hour is a really delightful six-gored skirt made of Brussels net. It fits closely over the hips, and is finished by a ten-inch, accordion-plaited frill headed by a two-inch puffing through which blue satin ribbon is run. The airy frilliness of this skirt makes it most attractive for wear with summer dancing frocks, although its transparency would, perhaps, make a silk or satin slip necessary. It will be found to be exceptionally good value at $3.

A French petticoat of nainsook, hand-made and cut on straight lines, is attractively finished at the bottom by two rows of heavy, pointed scallops, one placed above the other. This petticoat is sheer enough to be worn with summer dresses, and yet durable enough to stand considerable wear. Price, $6.50. Only a very few skirts of this particular model are available, although many equally attractive ones may be had.

Note:—Addresses of the shops will be furnished on request, or the Shopping Department of Vogue will buy for you without extra charge.

SMART FASHIONS for LIMITED INCOMES

A CERTAIN clever American girl, who shone in society not so many seasons since, achieved an enviable reputation for smartness in dress by a method which the woman with a limited income would do well to follow. Her allowance for dress was small, and her manner of life made a large and varied wardrobe a necessity. It was impossible, therefore, for her to buy expensive materials and trimmings, yet her frocks had a certain individuality which gave them distinction. According to her philosophy, it is much better to cultivate a simple originality in dress than to make a great effort to imitate the elaborate gowning of women whose incomes are lavish.

One needs certainly a gown which will do for bridge luncheons, garden parties, and fêtes in general. It is suggested that if this gown is of chiffon, the beauty of the material, with a flower added, perhaps, to strike a note of contrast, will prove to be sufficient unto itself without even a vestige of trimming. The model shown in the middle of the page could be very charmingly developed in this manner. There is an exquisite range of color from which to choose for the contrasts which are so important. The Quaker demureness of this particular gown, cinder-gray with the vest and neck frill of white tulle, is a favorite effect of Callot's. The ribbon which is caught under the tulle frill of the bodice is black, and the rose at the waist-line is a great flare of sheer white muslin with a few green leaves tucked under it. This gown might also be developed effectively in a dull blue chiffon combined with two shades of plum-purple. In this case, the rose and the ribbon should, of course, be of the purple, and the gown of blue. This simple frock has really more appeal than an elaborate model, and its cost may be very reasonable as the design is one which will not tax the ingenuity of the small dressmaker, and the Callot chiffons, of which it should be made, sell for ninety-five cents a yard.

Chiffon Serves This Season the Three-Fold Purpose of the Diaphanous, Day-time Frock, the Décolleté Dinner Gown, and the Slight Wrap for Summer—Crevices in the Wardrobe

The first illustration on the page shows a gown of absinthe-green chiffon trimmed with cream net. The slip petticoat is of very light weight white satin with one layer of chiffon veiling over it. Over this is a drapery of chiffon, which is somewhat full in the back, and in front is cut away slantwise from a seam which extends down about twelve inches from the belt. The arrangement of chiffon over the shoulders is very simple, and novel draperies of net slant away from the arm in the same fashion as the skirt drapery slants back over the knees. A tiny net vest, forming a low V, fills in the front, and the girldle and flower are of fuchsia-colored silk.

The frock sketched at the right of the page is also of chiffon. The slip of white satin is cut round length and looped up on the left side. Over the slip is hung a tunic of white chiffon edged in lace, and over this falls a second tunic of wood-brown chiffon edged with a row of chiffon ball-buttons. The upper tunic extends over the bodice to the bust, and is finished at the left with a large chou of brown tulle, which is caught in place by a cut-steel buckle. The top of the bodice is of cream net, as are also the sleeves. Folds of the net, edged with a tiny frill, are laid in a small fichu. The diaphanous shoulder drapery is very soft and becoming.

A good lace flounce, left over perhaps from some passé gown, might be used in the making of the gown sketched in the middle of page 74. The long, square-trained skirt is of old-gold chiffon hung over a China silk slip of the same shade. The top of the bodice is very sheer, and the sleeves are composed of only one layer of the gold chiffon mounted on a lining of flesh-colored chiffon. At the neck a nice finishing (Continued on page 74)

Mint, that always delightful ingredient for summer drinks, is freely used in this punch

THE simultaneous arrival of warm weather and fresh fruits demands that the hostess utilize the edible possibilities of the latter to satisfy the tastes inspired by the former. The strawberry that comes with June is the foundation for numberless cool drinks and desserts. The recipe for one beverage is as follows: After beating the yolk of one egg, stir in half a cupful of strawberry juice and a tablespoonful of sugar; then add to it the white of the egg beaten to a stiff froth, put the whole into a glass, and fill with ice water; the white of the egg remains on top, and in the middle of it is placed a whole strawberry.

A "Celestial" drink is made by adding to two quarts of milk the following ingredients: four teaspoonfuls of vanilla, four wine-glassfuls of cherry juice, one-half a cupful of mashed strawberries, one-half a cupful of pineapple cut in small pieces, and sugar to taste. Let this set on ice for three hours, then pour through a sieve. Serve the mixture in glasses filled with cracked ice, and drop on the top of each glass some whipped cream decorated with cherries.

COOLING PUNCHES

Two delicious punches are made with tea and mint as foundations. The recipe for the tea punch is as follows: Over one tablespoonful of orange pekoe tea pour three pints of boiling water, and cover for six minutes; strain the tea, and with it mix the juice of three lemons, three oranges, and a finely shredded pineapple, and as much of a syrup, made by boiling one pint of water and a pint of sugar for five minutes, as is necessary to make it sweet. This punch may be served either on cracked ice in glasses or from a punch bowl with a large piece of ice in the middle. A mineral water may be added to this, and bits of fruit placed on top.

For mint punch, chop fine a dozen large stalks of mint, and pound. Add half a cupful of powdered sugar and the juice of two lemons, and let this stand for two hours, stirring occasionally. Make a syrup of half a cupful of sugar, a pint of water, the yellow rind of two lemons, sliced, and six or seven freshly cut sprigs of mint. Chill this and add to the lemon and mint, with a quart of shaved ice and two bottles of ginger ale.

FRUIT DESSERTS

For a Fig Paste, put a pound of dried figs through a meat grinder, add a quart of warm water, and let it simmer on the back of the stove for two hours. Then remove and place in the refrigerator for several hours before serving. When ready to use, put in a glass, and pile high with chopped marshmallows mixed with whipped cream. Garnish with whole walnut meats.

Strawberry Parfait consists of a cupful of crushed strawberries with a cupful of sugar sprinkled over them, mixed with a half pint of sweet cream, beaten stiff. Put into a covered mold, place in a freezer with cracked ice and salt for three hours. Serve in a glass with whipped cream and a strawberry on top.

For Fruit and Jelly Cocktail, dissolve half a package of gelatine in a pint of boiling water to which has been added half a cupful of sugar. Make this into three different colored jellies—banana, strawberry, and pineapple—by using vegetable colorings. Keep in the refrigerator to cool, and when ready to serve, cut the jelly into cubes and mix in some of the fresh fruits. Serve with a syrup made by boiling one banana, half a cupful of strawberries, and two slices of pineapple in a pint of water and one and a half cupfuls of sugar. Boil slowly for fifteen minutes, and then strain. It should be chilled before it is poured over the jelly in the glasses.

Thin, slightly sweetened wafers or small fancy cakes are usually served with these frozen desserts and drinks.

The TUB FROCK: SUCCESSOR to the LINEN SUIT

The One-Piece Dress Usurps the Privileges of the Linen Suit, and Starched Fabrics Yield Precedence to Soft, Clinging Crêpes and Voiles

A model of French-blue ratine marks the medium between the sports frock and the more elaborate afternoon tub dress

THE linen suit, which for so long held undisputed sway over the fortunes of summer modes, has gradually yielded precedence to the one-piece dress. Last summer a few smart suits made their appearance, but this season they are shown scarcely at all, either by dressmakers or shops.

For morning, fashion sanctions the wearing of the plainest of tub frocks, made in the simplest and most comfortable manner, usually in ratine, crêpe, or mercerized lawn or linen.

A model typical of the season's plain tub frock is shown in the well-made gown of mustard-colored linen sketched at the upper right of the page. The bodice is finished by a coolly pretty vest and collar of finely tucked white lawn trimmed with Valenciennes lace. This is just the sort of simple, good-style frock which it is very hard to buy reasonably and very hard to have made successfully. Such details as the buttons down the front of the vest, the ball-button trimming on the little straps, and the brown suede belt are excellent features of the model. It may be bought from a good shop for a moderate $7.

DECORATIVE MATERIALS

Rather less severe is the gown of loosely woven, French-blue ratine that is sketched at the upper left of the page. The material is so decorative in itself that the gown requires little trimming. It is cut with a small yoke and revers of the material, and is relieved by a turn-over collar and a vest of fine, white Swiss embroidery. The buttons are white over simulated, white buttonholes. The back panel of the skirt, which corresponds to the front, is slightly gathered at the waist-line, which gives it a pretty fulness. As is usual in such dresses, the waist and skirt are joined by a belt, and the opening is arranged at the side-front under the vest and the skirt panel. This frock is priced at $23.50.

The Russian blouse has proved to be a very popular model, and has been adapted in various ways for summer frocks. A really practical morning dress on this order is sketched at the lower left of the page. The skirt, the vest, and the collar and cuffs are of white crêpe, and the jacket is of printed crêpe with a white ground. It is quite a delightful model either in blue and white or mustard and white. Price, $14.75.

DRAPING THE TUB FROCK

The question of the draping of the tub frock is solved in the gown sketched at the lower right of the page. The model is simple and practical for morning wear, and yet if made in a rose-colored voile with broad collar and cuffs of fine, écreu batiste embroidery it would be quite smart enough for an informal luncheon. In the original model the collar and cuffs are threaded with black velvet, and the front of the bodice and skirt are trimmed with oval, pearl buttons. This is an admirable illustration of the type of summer frock which does not lose its smartness by being tubbed, and which does not lose its practicality by being draped. If made in any soft fabric like French crêpe or cotton voile, which launders without starch, the draping will fall properly after it has been washed.

It is in gowns of this kind that the change in the character of the tub dress is most noticeable. A few seasons ago only simple or tucked styles were seen, but to-day it is entirely the little intricacies of cut and drapery which give individuality to the distinctive models. Many plain models are to be found in heavy materials, which, however, lack the charm of the voiles and crêpes which lend themselves to broken lines.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE TUB FROCK

Tub frocks are evolving into the most delightful dresses for luncheon and afternoon wear. Rather elaborate effects may be gained by combinations of plain and figured voiles and trimmings of thread and shadow laces. Sometimes a satin girdle, or possibly a few trimming buttons, must be removed before laundering, but the dress itself may go into the tub.

One curious whim of fashion is that, having discarded separate skirts and coats, the most attractive dresses are made to simulate a coat with revers, and the open neck filled in by a tucker or by becoming little frills.

A gown of this kind is shown in the middle of the group on page 50. It is a one-piece model with a skirt of white crêpe embroidered in old-blue floss to match the color of the jacket of toile éponge. Embroidery similar to that used on the skirt trims the sides of the coat, the collar, and the deep cuffs. The yoke is of white net with two rows of plaited Valenciennes lace outlining a double row of pearl buttons. A white leather belt completes this costume, which nicely answers the purpose of an afternoon gown. This frock may be purchased in a Fifth Avenue specialty shop for $27.

FORMALITY IN A WASH DRESS

The tall, slender woman will find the gown at the right of the above model very becoming. The rather pronounced drapery of the skirt is more like that of an afternoon than a morning gown, although the dress is made of a fairly heavy, mustard-colored linen. It is the cut and the simple manner by which the drapery is achieved which gives distinction to the model. By way of contrast to the material, the deep collar and cuffs are of very sheer, embroidered batiste. A brocaded white ribbon, button-trimmed, forms a broad girdle which is unique enough to be not only a girdle but a trimming. Price, $30.

The gown shown at the left of the group is distinguished from the usual frock of its type not only by the combination of two materials, but by the clever line of their joining, which suggests a pannier. The figured material is white, scattered with blue flowers which are centered and foliated in red to match the color of the ribbon girdle. Two soft plaits laid on each side of the box plait, which defines a front panel, give a lengthwise drapery to the skirt, which is becoming and consistent with the pannier line. The lower half of the sleeves, like the lower part of the skirt, is of plain white crêpe. The sleeves are finished with Cluny lace cuffs which match the attractively shaped, lace collar. Such a gown, although simple enough for an informal luncheon, is effective enough for a garden party. Price, $29.50.

HIGH TIDE in BATHING FASHIONS

[Editor's Note: There is, perhaps, no one costume in the whole gamut of a woman's wardrobe that requires such discrimination of choice as the simple-seeming bathing suit, and yet, oddly enough, this particular phase of the summer mode has been strangely neglected by the smart couturiers. Apart from the commonplace, ready-made models one has little choice; for this reason VOGUE has specially designed these original suits to meet this need, and patterns may be obtained at the very special price quoted at the foot of this article.]

SINCE much of the diversion of the summer is the life of the beach, the bathing costume as it is silhouetted against the unshaded background of sky and sea becomes exceedingly important; at no time is a pleasing effect of line or color more essential. Although absurdly superfluous in the eyes of the French, our modest custom of considering stockings and skirt a necessary accompaniment of a bathing costume is as much due to esthetics as to prudery. They really do lend charm to the costume as a whole. Many good effects may be obtained in the arrangement of the skirt, and the laced sandals are pretty in themselves.

gansett, and other American beaches vary each season not only in cut but in materials. Many of the new features of the mode may usually be adapted to the requirements of the beach with delightful results. To be pretty, drapery must have length, and therefore it is barred as unsuitable for the bathing costume; nor has the conservative taste of the American woman permitted the adoption of the brilliant colors, which, after the manner of the French costume, rival the vividly striped umbrellas set here and there on the beach; but the tunic and the Russian blouse are features which, with the surplice closing, the vest, and the sash, have been adapted to the bathing suit with success. These details admit of many arrangements.

NEW MATERIALS FOR NEW SUITS

The diagonal closing which slims the figure is illustrated in the black taffeta suit shown at the upper left of this page. A distinctly ribbed white moire which forms the one-sided collar and the shaped cuffs is the only trimming.

Materials for bathing suits come in great variety. In addition to the taffeta, louisine, and satin formerly used, we have now adopted silk moire antique, silk crêpe, and some of the ribbed tussors and striped taffetas. These fabrics, in black or dark blue, may be lightened charmingly by a trimming of Bulgarian embroidery. Polka-dotted taffeta is also decidedly effective, but perhaps the most attractive material of all is moire silk embroidered in black and white or colored wools which give an appearance of éponge. The use of this trimming is effectively shown in the costume sketched in the middle of this page. The collar, vest, cuffs, belt, and girdle are of white, ribbed silk embroidered in black wools. This embroidery makes a decidedly good contrast to the lusterless black silk of the suit.

A few seasons ago the use of Irish lace for collar and cuffs, although a questionable point in taste, was sanctioned. Now, however, when lace is used at all, filet and imitation filet replace Irish. These laces are more akin to drawn linen than an open lace, and they are appropriate and becoming.

TURBANS, SASHES, AND SANDALS

Many black costumes are given color this season by turbans of vividly striped silk, and sashes knotted about the waist with the ends falling to the bottom of the skirt. Such a costume of black with a filet lace collar extending over the shoulders was recently worn at Palm Beach. A newer phase of the same idea is shown in the suit sketched to the right of the two upper sketches on page 52. Instead of a sash there is a short, shaped tunic below which is an accordion plaited skirt set on a plain yoke. For this suit a plain, ribbed moire, would be an excellent material, with a polka-dotted trimming of blue and tan taffeta, and a vest of white moire.

It seems an unwritten law that no color is too bright for a turban; brilliant reds, purples, and mustard are used. The turbans are made not unlike those of other seasons, except that one upstanding loop of the material is usually placed directly in the front.

Another innovation in the realm of the bathing suit is the small-brimmed hat, such as is shown on the figure sketched at the lower left of page 52. In shape it is the sports hat of stitched linen, but it is made of silk. For this purpose every shade known to the Futurist is used in odd patterns. The one shown is of rubberized silk, and may be bought at a Fifth Avenue shop for $2.95.

INSTANCES WHERE COTTON AND LINEN FABRICS, WITH THEIR
MOST ABLE ALLY, EMBROIDERY, HAVE ACHIEVED MARKED SUCCESS
IN MORNING AND AFTERNOON GOWNS AND IN A TAILLEUR

LET the woman who is considering an afternoon frock review the merits of one of the new silk or cotton crêpes—soft, clinging, of an appealing surface and luster, yet with enough body to preclude any danger of “slinkiness.” Here Drécoll employs a white silk crêpe, Canton possibly. Almost the fabric makes the frock, so lovely is it in itself. Yet the trimmings of marine-blue silk seem not superfluous, giving as they do an accent to the gown. The neck frill is of plaited blue net, the narrow girdle of the white crêpe, deeply fringed, and the motifs on the bodice are embroidered in blue floss.

AS though black and yellow were not a sufficiently striking contrast in itself, Agnes has selected the deepest-dyed yellow she could find for this linen morning frock. The collar and vest of white, embroidered batiste, though they introduce still another contrast, really serve to tone down the whole. Black soutache is applied on tabs set about the vest, on tabs extending up the sleeves, and on others depending from crescents of the yellow linen which control the skirt drapery. In back, the black satin sash hangs over a panel which in turn falls over a box plait looped up below the knees.

SUCH elaborate embroidery on a tailor may seem inconsistent, yet when one remembers that embroidery was developed principally for the decoration of the outer “tabard” worn by the knights of the middle ages, it appears but the natural heritage of the coat suit. The embroidery on this green rep suit is in self-tone floss. It forms the wide, stitched-down collar and the cuffs, and, not content with this ample display of adornment, Premet has edged the short, oddly cut jacket with shaped pieces of the same embroidery, weighted the overskirt with a broad band of it, and laid it across the sash-ends.

THE DRAWING-ROOM SHOP

THE great Paris couturiers have long appreciated the advantage of effacing all traces of commercialism from the salons in which they display to their fastidious patrons the latest modes. The dress-makers of New York, their more than successful imitators, have been quick to follow French example, and there are now to be found in this city shops that in beauty of appointments rival those of the home of fashion.

One of these has recently been built by the Schneider-Anderson Company. It is twelve stories high, Italian Renaissance in design, and displays throughout both beauty and distinction. The first three stories are built of white marble, and the rest are of white, mat-glazed terra-cotta. Upon entering the building, one passes through a hall paved and lined with white marble, to an elevator operated by a gray-liveried attendant. The salon is introduced by a charming little entresol, carpeted in solid blue velvet, and furnished with marble pedestals supporting vases of ferns, and with carved, white marble benches covered with velvet cushions to match the carpet.

THE DRAWING-ROOM SALON

The salon is furnished in king's-blue, a rare color which must be used with taste and discretion. In this instance, it is brilliantly successful; it dominates the room, for there is no jarring note of other tints, and the soft gray of the paneled walls and the dim gold frames of the antique-finished mirrors harmonize with it perfectly. The room is of fine proportions, fifty by forty feet, and the air of spaciousness is accentuated by the height of the beamed ceiling. Very lovely is the lighting, supplied by crystal chandeliers in a delicate French design with bands of carved and gilded ormolu, and by the lamps of carved wood, gilded in antique finish, and painted in shades of palest yellow. The wood of the Italian Renaissance furniture is gray, rubbed to a dull finish, and the carving is picked out in dull gold. A heavy, soft brocade of unusual design in king's-blue covers chairs and sofas, and is used for the hangings; the carpet, a rich, plain velvet, is of the same color.

From three large French windows a flood of light pours into the room, softened by panels of plain, cream net, edged with one-and-a-half-inch bands of cream linen. These curtains are laid flat against the glass. The rounded tops of the windows have a valence of blue brocade edged with dull gold braid, and the heavy brocade curtains are tied back with blue silk cords, and are lined with amber silk.

PICTURESQUE UTILITY

Several of the mirrors are decorated in an unusual way. These are six feet high, and fold in three like a screen. The mirror is in the middle panel, and the side panels are covered in brocade. These screens are used as little, individual "trying-on" rooms for hats, and insure a certain amount of privacy. The oval mirrors which are used for the decoration of the walls are in different designs of the Italian Renaissance, and have beautifully carved frames of wood gilded in an antique finish.

Picturesque is the adaption of a sedan-chair for use as a telephone booth. It is upholstered inside in brocade, has little curtains at the windows of cream faille, and is painted outside in cream white; its delicate carving is touched with silver. The fitting-rooms are paneled in Circassian walnut, and each has its writing desk of the same wood.

The crowning feature of the room is the stage. The raised platform, reached by three steps, is fifteen feet broad and ten feet deep, and is carpeted in blue velvet. Over the stage is a throne canopy, painted to match the paneling of the wall and decorated with delicate carving. From the canopy fall a scalloped valence of brocade and heavy side curtains of the same material. Two massive, gilded, standing lamps, similar in design to the smaller lamps in the salon, are placed on either side of the stage.

EFFECTIVE LIGHTING

The lighting here is most effective. Sunken in the floor is an opening in which is a row of electric lights in opaque globes; these throw a soft light upward. This opening is protected by heavy plate glass, and when the stage is not in use, it is concealed by a strip of carpet. The novel drop-curtain is made of king's-blue chiffon lined with the same material in emerald green, and this combination of color produces a lovely opalescent effect. When these curtains are fastened back they disclose a large mirror set into the wall between two columns at the back of the stage. This mirror, by reflecting the salon, adds to the effect of spaciousness, and delusively presents an endless vista of rooms.

It is an interesting experience to sit in this charming environment, to watch the manikins, garbed in imported creations, part the curtains, pause, and pose in studied grace for a moment, and then to see them glide about the room, stopping here and there for critical inspection.

Not only is the patron of the establishment more at home in this drawing-room atmosphere, but the gowns displayed are shown to better advantage, as they are thus seen against their probable future background. As the manikins walk slowly about the room, Madame can easily visualize herself in the same gowns in her own private life.

For this, a gown for Miss Keane's personal wardrobe, it has been developed in deep cream lace and sable

Taffeta, which many of the dressmakers spared no pains to popularize this spring, yet failed, has not been slighted by all. Jay of London chose a shade of canary-yellow taffeta to develop this unusual costume of décolleté frock and jacket—not a stage toilette. With the yellow silk are used the lovely harmonizing shades of old lace, embroidered in silver and Sèvres-blue. The tight bodice encloses a short-sleeved, low-necked guimpe of this lace

The coat to the gown shown at the left makes of it quite another costume. The yellow taffeta is given a lighter accent in the collar of point lace, yellowed with age, and in the rows of ermine down the front; and a darker accent in the soft black velvet, fastened beneath a crushed pink rose, which circles the waist. The whole gives an afternoon costume of beauty and formality

SEEN ON THE STAGE

THERE are many indications at the present moment that the general public of Chicago is more eagerly interested in dramatic artistry than the general public of New York. The fact that many plays which had succeeded in Chicago and had run there for several weeks, or even months, have subsequently been rejected in New York was formerly assumed to indicate the superiority of metropolitan taste; but this assumption has recently been broken down by the fact that several plays of the first order of merit which had failed in New York have subsequently succeeded in Chicago. It is surely a less egregious error to patronize too many plays than to patronize too few.

We of New York may readily forgive Chicago for over-estimating many American dramas which have seemed to us too local in appeal, since there is always a glory in excessive enthusiasm, however it may be misplaced; but we can only take our hats off to Chicago for its proper estimate of many plays that we have undervalued. The recent history of Mr. Stanley Houghton's "Hindle Wakes" is a case in point. This serious and earnest comedy, so novel in conception, so profoundly true in characterization, was praised by many of the metropolitan reviewers, yet it was so sparsely patronized by the public of New York that it was soon withdrawn by the management. After its metropolitan failure it was imported to Chicago by the Chicago Theatre Society, and achieved an instant success that led to its prosperous continuance for many months.

WHERE CHICAGO HAS FAILED

The mood of the Chicago public toward such worthy works as this has been indubitably influenced by the Drama League of America. This society—the aims and activities of which were discussed in the last issue of this magazine—received its initial organization in Chicago, and still maintains its strongest center in the city of its birth. By its organized campaign of paid attendance at important plays it has already succeeded in saving many worthy works which, as commercial ventures, were trembling in the balance. It succeeded notably in the case of Mr. Charles Kenyon's sincere and searching study of the desperate emotions of the poor, entitled "Kindling," which had failed completely in New York, but which, since its successful production in Chicago, has been played to a profit for over a hundred weeks. It must be recorded, however, that the Drama League has failed signally, on one or two occasions, to rise to its opportunities. It failed to support "The Scarecrow," by Mr. Percy MacKaye, after the late Henry B. Harris had resurrected it at the request of its committee; and very recently it allowed that lovely and unprecedented work of art, "The Yellow Jacket," to languish to oblivion for lack of adequate support during the first week of its appearance in Chicago. Such failures as these must be charged against the Drama League; but, on the other hand, it must be admitted that the Chicago center of the League has succeeded in saving a greater number of interesting plays than it has allowed to succumb for lack of adequate support. This fact is attested not only by the statistics gathered by the Drama League itself, but also by the written testimony of many grateful managers.

THE CHICAGO SPIRIT AT HIGH TIDE

But the special spirit of Chicago as contrasted with the spirit of New York, is perhaps illustrated more emphatically by the activities of two local institutions—the Chicago Theatre Society and the Chicago Little Theatre.

The Chicago Theatre Society is an organization of leading citizens, some of whom are notable for intellectual distinction, and the rest of whom are endowed with extraordinary wealth. They are, in the fine sense, amateurs of the theatre, and they are willing to expend any amount up to fifty thousand dollars per annum to secure for Chicago the best that is being thought and said in the theatre of to-day. The directors of this philanthropic institution are Mr. Arthur Aldis, Mr. Arthur Bissell, Mr. H. C. Chatfield-Taylor, Mr. Hamlin Garland, Mr. Kenneth S. Goodman, Mrs. Harold F. McCormick, Mr. Roy McWilliams, Mr. Ira Nelson Morris, Mr. John C. Shaffer, and Mr. Lorado Taft. It will be observed that this Society is made up of people of culture and taste who have had no professional association with the theatre. Its most notable directors are a novelist, a biographer, and a sculptor, and the social position of its sponsors is a guarantee of its enlightenment and earnestness.

The Chicago Theatre Society does not undertake to make productions on its own initiative; its activity is confined to importing worthy works which it thinks Chicago ought to see. The Society controls an optional lease of the Fine Arts Theatre—a tasteful and comfortable auditorium, seating the convenient number of five hundred and fifty spectators—which is situated on Michigan Avenue, in close proximity to the leading clubs and hotels. This admirable little house is tactfully dignified in decoration, and is so arranged that the attention of the audience can not easily be directed to itself. There are no proscenium boxes, but late diners are ushered quietly into compartments reserved at the rear of the single gallery, and the entire audience is gathered into intimate awareness of the stage. The Fine Arts Theatre is, indeed, an easy house to act in.

WHAT THE INTELLECTUALS MAY DO

The Chicago Theatre Society makes it its business to domesticate in this ingratiating auditorium any production which it deems particularly worthy of support. The procedure of the Society is to guarantee the gross receipts, up to a certain and satisfactory sum per week. If the actual receipts fall below the guarantee, the Society cheerfully pays the difference. The producing manager is thereby insured against loss, and the public of Chicago is assured an opportunity of witnessing a production which might otherwise have been relinquished because of its financial hazard.

It is interesting to review the repertory that has been offered, during the current season at the Fine Arts Theatre, by the Chicago Theatre Society. It includes no less than forty-five plays. Among the authors represented are Euripides, Shakespeare, Goldsmith, Sheridan, Arnold Bennett, St. John Ervine, Gilbert Cannon, John Galsworthy, St. John Hankin, Stanley Houghton, Lady Gregory, John Masefield, Arthur Schnitzler, Bernard Shaw, J. M. Synge, W. B. Yeats, and Granville Barker. For the pleasure of presenting the works of these authors to Chicago, the Society has generously paid out several thousand dollars; and the directors feel themselves sufficiently reimbursed by having accomplished something for the city.

THE QUIXOTISM OF CHICAGO

It is difficult for a native of New York to appreciate at its full value the quixotism of this endeavor. These social leaders of Chicago are willing to bury fifty thousand dollars in the ground in order that they may afford their fellow citizens a glimpse of the best that is being given in the theatre of to-day. The zest of this activity may seem obvious enough to an idealist, but to the plain man in the street it is amazing. The magnitude of the endeavor would at once become apparent to any New Yorker if he were confronted with the comparatively little problem of raising twenty-five thousand dollars to guarantee the greatest theatrical performance that is to be witnessed to-day in the entire theatre of the world. M. Mounet-Sully is now an old man, and not many years are left during which he may offer his supreme performance of the greatest drama of the greatest of the Greeks. Yet no effort is inaugurated in New York to import the Comédie Française production of "Œdipus, the King," before this latest lingering of the Titans sails beyond the evening star.

But a more emphatic instance of the quixotism of Chicago is the institution of the Little Theatre. This organization maintains, at the present time, a repertory that is made up of Gilbert Murray's translation of "The Trojan Women" of Euripides, Granville Barker's paraphrase of Arthur Schnitzler's "Anatol," W. B. Yeats's "On Baile's Strand" and "The Shadowy Waters," August Strindberg's "Creditors," "The Stronger," and "Pariah," W. W. Gibson's "Women-kind" and "The Ferry," and Alice Brown's "Joint Owners in Spain."

The Chicago Little Theatre is housed in a tiny auditorium that seats only ninety-one spectators. The company offers only four performances per week, and the price of admission is one dollar to the general public, and fifty cents to the members of the Society that founded the institution. The commercial capacity of the house is therefore not more than two hundred and seventy-five dollars per week, and yet, at this rate, the Little Theatre has succeeded in meeting all its current expenses and in paying off a large amount of its initial debt.

Billie Burke, in spite of an unconquerable femininity, gives a fairly manful account of herself in "Amazons"

The Little Theatre is directed by Mr. Maurice Browne, who, together with his wife, who assists him in playing leading parts in the various productions, draws the diminutive salary of eighteen dollars per week. The other actors and actresses play for nothing, and their names are not even announced on the programs of the plays. The Little Theatre company is composed of amateurs, in the highest sense of the word. It seems literally true that "nobody works for money, and nobody works for fame; but each for the joy of the working." The slender income of the company is paid out for rent and the expenses of production. Both of these items are well within the budget. The auditorium is merely a vacant office in the Fine Arts Building. The visitor takes an elevator to the sixth or seventh floor, and is ushered into a deep and narrow room, in which the seats for auditors have been arranged. This room is rather noisy, and Euripides is frequently forced to contend against Leoncavallo, whose prologue to "I Pagliacci" is being spiritedly played in several adjacent emporiums for the sale of pianos; but at least the Little Theatre imposes a hypothetical sense of quiet. The tiny stage is pictorial and is admirably lighted, and the acting is adequate.

At a recent performance of "The Trojan Women" which was witnessed by the present writer, the stage disclosed a picture which was truly admirable. The chorus was represented by four or five women who drifted easily into poses that were eminently sculptural. The costumes, designed and executed by Mrs. Lou Wall Moore, were pleasing both in drawing and in color. The scenery was both cheap and satisfactory, and the lighting was particularly admirable. The footlights were suppressed, and the stage was artistically illuminated from the top and from the sides. The reading was adequate, and much of the acting was impressive.

When a performance so satisfactory as this can be given by a company of amateurs, and can be supported by a public that is avid of the art of drama, the dramatic critic can merely marvel at the waste of money and of misdirected effort on innumerable more ambitious enterprises that accomplish nothing for the education of the public taste. Three hundred dollars per week seems an inconsiderable sum compared with the money that is continually wasted by commercial managers, and yet the huge and rich metropolis could scarcely be persuaded to advance this amount, which Chicago has gladly contributed to the support of its experimental Little Theatre. At present, it would seem that New York has the preponderance of power but that Chicago has the preponderance of spirit; and in the theatre, as in every other exercise of mind, it must be said that "to travel hopefully is a better thing than to arrive, and the true success is to labor."

"THE AMAZONS"

THE campaign of resuscitating old plays which was begun by the New York managers early in April, and has already afforded occasion for comment in the pages of this magazine, has recently been carried to a culmination in the revival of two comparatively early works by the foremost living dramatists of England and America.

"The Amazons," by Sir Arthur Pinero, was produced shortly after "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," but in mood and manner it seems to date from his earlier period, before the epoch-making revolution in his art. Perhaps the most interesting point to be recorded concerning this satirical romance is the fact that Pinero antedated in this composition the employment of that attitude toward life which has subsequently been assumed as the special property of Mr. Bernard Shaw. Mr. Shaw has made his

MISS MARY PICKFORD, WHOSE SCHOOL OF DRAMATIC ART WAS THE MOVING PICTURES, AND WHO HAS THIS SEASON CAPTURED MUCH PRAISE IN "A GOOD LITTLE DEVIL," IS OF THAT CHILD-LIKE TYPE THAT DEMANDS MOST SIMPLE DRESSING

Not in the lines of this dress, which are decidedly conventional, but in the blending of colors does its beauty reside. Down from the waist shimmers a glorious length of brocade interwoven of gold, soft blue, and pink, and over it falls a drapery of flesh-colored chiffon. The bodice is of the chiffon, vested with matching tulle, and enriched with bands of mink

This unassuming little dress for the ingénue type is of French cotton voile, figured with large, brown dots and a small pattern in brown and old-blue. It is plainly hung, and knows no trimming save three plaitings of changeable blue and brown taffeta laid in scallops on the skirt, a taffeta sash, and a neck frill of pointe d'esprit finished with a flat, silk collar. The hat is of black picot straw, trimmed with a wreath and pompon of cock feathers

This is the sort of young-grandmotherly dress in which the little actress looks and feels most natural, and one which she took much delight in designing for her play. It is one of those picture gowns of white satin brocade relieved by blue and pink flowers laid in among the passementerie designs about the round neck, and used to finish the short, puff sleeves and the round girdle of blue satin

THE GARDEN PARTY IS A FERTILE
THEME ABOUT WHICH PLAYS THE IMAGINATION OF THE COUTURIERS,
EVER CREATING SUCH VARIATIONS
AS A SASH GATHERED FAN-WISE, A
TRIPLE VEST, EXPANSIVE REVERS

THERE is certainly no temptation at this season to overdo somberness in dress, but in the summer riot of color, wary must that couturier be who would avoid extravagance in the use of gay fabrics. In this garden-party gown of mineral-green crêpe meteor, Drécoll has achieved just the right distinction between the two. The bodice has a surplice of écru net edged with a plaiting so slight that it merely ripples. The wide, black satin girdle holds a sash which peeps above it in a fan-shaped ruche, and falls below it in a fringed end embroidered heavily in yellow and green and blue.

FASHION tends to reduce all dressing to a common level of similarity; personality tends to differentiate it. Here a model which the mode has made a commonplace is distinguished by those touches of individuality that bring out the dissimilarity in similar things. Without introducing anything novel in cut or fabric, Drécoll has created a distinctly personal gown. Over a fourreau of écru lace and chiffon he drapes black chiffon, slipped kimono-like over the shoulders, and in a tunic over the skirt. Lace revers fall away from the throat, and a black satin girdle finishes the waist.

PAQUIN here goes on the principle that if a thing is good, perhaps two or three of it are better; so, in addition to vesting the bodice of this gown of violet, brocaded crêpe, she has fitted a vest conspicuously over the top of the skirt. The pointed lapels of the jacket are partly of écru chiffon and partly of écru, embroidered batiste, and they fall from the shoulders in a way that gives breadth to the figure. Bands of embroidered batiste outline the écru satin panel upon which the skirt drapery is caught at the knees. The costume is girdled and sashed at the right with violet satin ribbon.

VOGUE

PATTERN SERVICE

SINCE the prettiest French lingerie—which is the loveliest made—is almost invariably embroidered even when combined with lace, women making their own lingerie naturally want to follow it. Vogue's Pattern Service will now furnish embroidery patterns in the new and attractive designs for lingerie, collars and cuffs, braiding or embroidery for women's dresses, when it is appropriate, and some delightfully individual styles for children's dresses. Initial letters (monograms or a name)—to be used on lingerie or handkerchiefs—will be made to order upon request.

On this page lingerie which will meet the summer requirement is illustrated, accompanied by the embroidery design which may be applied to it. In the nightgown, for instance, the embroidery pattern will fit the neck of the gown; in the chemises the buttonholed scallop will exactly match the outline of the tissue paper pattern.

No. 127/11 is a charming butterfly design applied to pattern No. 1783/11. Perforated embroidery pattern and nightgown pattern are 50 cents each

The embroidery patterns, however, are quite separate from the tissue-paper patterns. The prices, which vary according to the design, are twenty-five and fifty cents.

DIRECTIONS FOR STAMPING

Full directions for stamping come with each pattern, which is also accompanied by a cake of stamping preparation. Place the material to be stamped on a flat surface with the pattern (smooth side up) on top of the material. Weight the corners, moisten the distributing pad with benzine or kerosene and rub first on the cake of stamping preparation and then back and forth on the pattern. When all parts of the pattern have been covered, remove it carefully. The impression of the design will be perfect.

The same pattern may be used over and over. Should an extra stamping cake be required, a good-sized cake can be supplied for ten cents.

In PURSUIT of THE PARIS BARGAIN

THE American bargain-hunter in Paris often buys in haste and repents at leisure, for the real bargain is an elusive thing, and one may visit the same shop three or four times before some obliging vendeuse will bring forth from a secret corner a cobwebby bit of lingerie or a delicately embroidered blouse bearing the same price-mark that one has noticed on really inferior articles on the bargain tables. Thus it happened a few days ago that, while I was looking over the tables laden with blouses, my friendly little saleswoman suddenly disappeared, and then returned with an air of mystery and a blouse so good-looking and so inexpensive that I at once ordered several. It was not a lace blouse, but a hand-made affair of fine handkerchief linen, a sketch of which is shown in the lower, left-hand corner. The well-shaped, embroidered collar, the cuffs, and the "truly" pocket with its little button, are beautifully finished, and yet for this blouse I only paid 25 francs.

INEXPENSIVE ORIGINALITY

The suspender blouse illustrated in the middle of the page was found in a small shop just off the rue de la Paix—which accounts for its comparatively high price of 65 francs. The suspenders, the lower part of the blouse, and the lower sleeves were made of white satin. The blouse top and the upper part of the sleeves were of figured white voile de soie. The plaited frill about the neck was of stitched white satin. A small bow of black tulle was placed at the point of the V in front. The satin suspenders were slipped through silk-embroidered slides, which were caught to the waist by pearl-buttoned straps.

The mantelet of silk crêpe shown second at the bottom of the page is light blue, and embroidered in red and black with little wreaths. It may also be had in yellow and other light colors. Price, 29 francs.

The chemisette of tulle, sketched in the middle, is a useful little article. It is hand-made, has a round collar, and a small, flat bow of plaited tulle at the throat. It sells for 3 francs, 90 centimes.

A modestly simple, hand-made nightgown is the one shown in the lower, right-hand corner. The gown, of exquisitely fine muslin, is seamed front and back alike, and fastened in front with three small pearl buttons. Plaited frills of four-inch footing and pink ribbon laced through eyelets at the high waist-line, form the trimming. The price of this is 23 francs. Pink crêpe de Chine of good quality was used for another nightgown. It was trimmed with Valenciennes lace and knots of pink ribbon, and cost 49 francs. A gown of thin pink silk, cut somewhat like a man's bathrobe, was marked 15 francs, 50 centimes. The turndown collar and short sleeves were embroidered with little dots in white. The gown fastened close about the throat, and was tied with cords of pink silk. A similar gown of pink mercerized cotton, tied with a pink cord, was marked 9 francs, 50 centimes.

The boudoir cap sketched in the upper, right-hand corner was made of fine batiste, and trimmed with frills and insertions of Valenciennes lace. The straight piece crossing the top of the head and falling below the ears was delicately embroidered in blue to harmonize with a blue peignoir. This cap was to be had for 29 francs.

BEAUTIFYING THE HOME

Dainty, medium-sized, circular doilies made of odd bits of lace and embroidery, cleverly joined by hand, and edged with narrow Valenciennes lace, sell for 2 francs, 95 centimes, the smallest size for less than half that sum, and the large size for 9 francs each. Centerpieces of this lace, round or oblong, may be had for 30 francs and upward. Although artificially yellowed, these doilies are exceedingly pretty, and look well on old mahogany.

Candle-shades of yellowed lace lined with rose or yellow chiffon are lovely, and may be bought for a small sum. The shades for candelabra or side-lights, made of silk in different shades of rose and yellow, and decorated with gold or silver lace, cost but 1 franc, 45 centimes—an absurdly small price. In silk edged with silk braid they are 20 centimes less. In New York, $1.50 is the price for shades similar to these.

Without hesitancy, it can be said that these blouses are the most truly feminine that Paris has yet decreed, as they were inspired by the favorite costume of the dainty French Queen, for whom they were named. It is doubtful whether Marie Antoinette ever wore Summer Frocks that were daintier than these blouses—and she was a luxury-loving woman!

Mail requests for these blouses will receive prompt and careful attention.

PATTERNS for a LAYETTE INCLUDING the EMBROIDERY DESIGNS

THE modern baby has the most careful consideration given to its wardrobe. Skirts must be just so long, and of a width which gives amplexness without clumsiness. The materials may be the sheerest imaginable, with fine embroidery and real lace as a trimming, providing an effect of over-elaboration is avoided.

As embroidery is what frequently gives the charm to baby clothes, we now can supply perforated embroidery patterns. The kimono sack, No. 107/11, and the scalloping for the wrapper, No. 105/11, are 50 cents each; a delicate design for a bib, No. 106/11, is 25 cents. Other designs not illustrated are a bib showing elaborate embroidery, No. 109/11, 25 cents; scalloping for the crown of the cap, No.

111/11, 25 cents; an embroidered panel for the dress in a delicate bow-knot and forget-me-not design, No. 108/11, 50 cents; an unusual small floral design for the cape and lower edge of the coat, No. 110/11, price, 50 cents.

FOR centuries long, artist and poet have dreamed in vain of flowers that shall not fade, of youth eternal and beauty that will never pass.

This is a dream no longer, for d'Orsay has discovered the secret of the subtle perfume of the flowers, the rose, the lily and the lilac. The perfume, which is as their very soul, he has caught, and imprisoned for us in exquisite jars, so that through all the year we breathe their delicate fragrance.

But to grant the poet's wish completely, to steal the perfume from the flowers, was not sufficient, for woman's charm and beauty must still be made immortal. Then the marvelous beauty products were created, and now the "Secret d'Orsay," used with the magic "Lait," imparts to the skin the softness, the freshness, the pearly lustre of eternal youth.

Hence what present could be more acceptable than one of these artistic boxes, which contains not only an assortment of the rarest extracts, but a choice of the most perfect of the beauty products, found at d'Orsay, 17 rue de la Paix, Paris, France, and at all leading stores in America

Flowers are summer's gift to the couturiers; here great clusters of apple blossoms are charmingly used

An original rose trimming tacked against a triangular plastron and veiled with chiffon

A skirt of old-gold chiffon with a tunic which served its apprenticeship as a flounce touch is given by round, chiffon buttons on one side and tiny, chiffon loops facing them on the other. At the waistline is a cluster of bright blue poppies. Unless one has enough remnants of lace for the bodice trimming, it may be made entirely of the chiffon with a very satisfactory effect.

THE POPULAR CHIFFONS

Popular as chiffons are for afternoon frocks, they are used quite as much as ever for evening gowns. The original of the gown sketched at the left on this page is a triumph in the blending of colors. A light green chiffon is mounted on a white silk underskirt which reaches midway between knee and ankle.

At the front the green overskirt is cut in an inverted V above the instep, and in the back it drops in a point which, weighted by a silk-lined hem, flops softly back and forth. A second skirt drapery (and another color) is introduced in the strip of cream chiffon which hangs slant-wise from the left hip and in a cascade down the back. Over each shoulder there is a drapery of periwinkle-blue tulle which meets at the top of the décolleté opening in the back, and slants off to the left side, where it is finished with a cluster of apple blossoms. At the front of the bodice another cluster of these flowers is placed against the fragment of shadow lace which fills the front of the bodice. This frock is one which will be noticed and admired even in the midst of gowns of elaborate gold-brocaded satin and jeweled trimming.

AN ORIGINAL ROSE TRIMMING

Putty-colored chiffon is used in the development of the model sketched at the right of the page. There is the mark of originality in the treatment of the crushed roses which are laid under the plastron of chiffon on the bodice. The roses are cream-white, touched at the tips with pink. They are tacked in close to the bodice, so that the line of the figure is not broken. About the neck of the bodice is a band of passementerie in very subdued gold and putty tones, hardly to be distinguished from the background of the gown.

The model sketched at the top of page 76 lends itself admirably to simple treatment, although the detail of the original is somewhat intricate. The gown is mounted on a slip of sapphire-blue satin, next above which is a flounce of cream lace darned through with gold thread. Above that is a tunic of white chiffon embroidered with little gold beads. A tunic of black chiffon over a cerise satin petticoat, with the lace flounce omitted, would be a simpler development of this model. The cluster of rhinestone buttons at the high-waisted front should not be omitted, as it is a somewhat novel touch well worth the expense of retaining.

A PRACTICAL AND PRETTY WRAP

The design of the wrap shown on page 76 is especially charming. It has the excellent quality of being practical in both color and treatment. It is of dark blue chiffon, lined with geranium-red crêpe, collared with blue net and finished with revers of red. A band of blue and red embroidery extends across the back and forms the sleeves, below which the coat falls in a graceful drapery.

Discriminating Women No Longer Buy Single-Drive Electrics

Study this illustration and you'll see why

EVERY one who has ever driven an electric has realized the great inconvenience of the single drive.

For no woman, alone in her car, ever looked well or felt comfortable perched up on the front seat in a chauffeur's position. And if the car happened to be a rear-seat drive, it meant continual strain and worry over inability to see ahead when the car was filled with guests.

In the Ohio, and in it alone, all this annoyance, inconvenience and danger is eliminated.

For the Ohio offers, as an exclusive feature on which we hold basic patents, a double drive from both front and rear seat, at your convenience.

The illustration shows graphically the wonderful convenience and comfort of this arrangement.

And the Ohio offers you in addition the utmost in beauty, in luxury and in comfort. Is it any wonder that single-drive electrics are rapidly becoming obsolete?

There are Ohio representatives in all large centers. Beautifully illustrated catalog mailed on request.

waist is plaited net lace, not the kind of plaiting which stands out in frills, but a plaiting which gives to the lace just a faint, rippled effect. For this purpose very thin lace which has a simple mesh, scarcely any pattern, and a straight edge, is much more charming than lace of an elaborate pattern. One waist in particular which is trimmed with this lace would be worth copying, and it is within the possibilities of even mediocre skill. It is of dark blue chiffon over self-toned China silk. The silk lining extends only to the yoke, which is of the transparent chiffon. The full-length sleeve of blue chiffon is put in with cording, and the body of the waist is perfectly plain without a tuck or a plait. Just a little toward the left side of the front is an opening in the chiffon which extends from collar to belt; it is finished on either side with the cording. This opening is filled in with a vest of white, cotton net put in quite full. A frill of the lace drops down midway from the vest to the waist-line, and a flat collar finishes the blouse at the throat.

TRICKS OF DRESS

There are always certain tricks of dress which make a particular fashion successful. The best-dressed women learn these little manipulations, but seldom speak of them, and it is either by chance or innate cleverness that one comes to know how good effects are obtained. To-day it is the adjusting of the veil with the tiny hats which must be mastered. If one goes about this matter in the ordinary way, the hair will be plastered against the face in the most depressing fashion. Veils must be very carefully adjusted to the small-brimmed hats or the hats with no brims at all. The lower edge of the veil must be pinned around the throat and fastened with a hairpin at the nape of the neck. All the fulness of the veil should be disposed of here, rather than on the hat as in the old way. Just enough fulness should be left to reach to the hat, where the veil should be pinned in place, and as it is drawn up, the hair will be pressed upward with it in a surprisingly good effect.

Two-toned, ribbed stockings in silk are not for the woman of small means, since $8 a pair is a price she may not pay. Everyone is not aware, however, that for $1.50 a pair this two-toned effect can be had in a lisle stocking which, to the casual observer, has the appearance of silk. These stockings are splendidly durable, very smart, and may be had in a black and white mixture, which is suitable for wear with any costume. With black, low shoes or white buckskin shoes this style of stocking will be found particularly good.

There is a new stocking of silk and lisle which combines two colors in a shot effect. They come in brown and black, purple and black, and green and black, and sell for $3.50 a pair. With these two substitutes one need no longer sigh in vain for the expensive stockings.

The little details of a costume are often really important features. An attractive slipper buckle, the placing of a brooch, or the shape of a hairpin even, will do much to complete the distinction of a toilette. One of the best touches for an evening gown is a scarf of tulle worn loosely across the shoulders. Tulle is fairly durable for this purpose, and it is even more effective after the first stiffness is gone. It should not be worn, however, save with a frock with which it harmonizes especially well. With the gowns of the present modes, in materials such as brocades and crêpes, and with the fashionable bodice drapery of self-tone chiffon, the transparent scarf is a charming accessory.

The summer coat is really a deception—just a film of chiffon with make-believe sleeves

Vogue will cut to order, in 36 bust only, patterns of the models shown in this department at the special price of $2 for a gown, $1 for a blouse or wrap.

TOOLS of TWO TRADES

THE shops have much to offer in the way of garden novelties. The basket illustrated would be a delight to the woman who likes to do some of her own pruning. It is furnished with a trowel, flower-scissors, pruning-knife, pruning-shears, weeding-fork, wire-cutter, and such handy articles as a hammer and pincers. Each fits into its appointed place in the light, leather-lined basket. Price, $9.50.

For the country cottage the night lamp illustrated will be found useful and safe. The base and handle are of tin with a fluted glass cover which sheds light and yet protects the candle from draughts. Price, 38 cents.

A SECRET OF GOOD COFFEE

It is really legitimate to grumble if the breakfast coffee is not just right, but given good coffee and the pot illustrated here, the opportunities for dissatisfaction will be few. These pots come in green, brown, and blue earthenware with a white lining. The coffee should be made in the French way—by putting the grounds in the top and pouring the water over them. When ready to go to the table, the top section of the pot, which contains the grounds, should be lifted off, and the cover put on the lower part. This pot comes in various sizes which allow for two, four, six, or eight cups of coffee. One holding two large cups—three of a smaller size—costs $1.25.

A CUP O' TEA

The brewing of tea is scarce less than a solemn rite with some people, and "the cup that cheers but not inebriates" deserves a fitting receptacle. Tea is considered to be really poisonous when the leaves are allowed to stand in it, so here is a tea-pot with an infuser in the top in which the leaves are put. The water is poured over the leaves but once. This pot comes in brown and green earthenware with a white lining and a white infuser. Price, $1.38.

A NOVEL RICE-BALL

Good tools can not make good cooks, but good cooks must have good tools—it is part of their secret of success. One big shop which makes a specialty of every sort of cooking and kitchen utensil is an enchanting place to any true housewife. All the little pots and kettles seem to hold such wonderful possibilities. Below, at the left, is a rice-ball—a perforated tin ball for steaming rice. The rice is put in the ball, and the ball itself is placed in the pot of water. Price, $1.50.

THE MOLDING OF MOUSSE

The mousse and ice desserts which are so especially good in hot weather may very easily be molded in attractive forms. A form for molding mousse is shown in the middle picture below. The screw at the top is removed, and the liquid mousse poured in. When tightly screwed up again the ball-like mold is packed in ice, and when the cream is ready to serve, the entire upper half of the mold may be lifted off, leaving the ball unbroken. Price, $1.50.

The fancy ice-cream mold shown at the lower right may have the cream packed in it after it is frozen. The mold should then be packed in ice until ready to serve. The best feature of this mold is that the center is open, which allows whipped cream or fruit to be heaped inside the ring of ice cream. The price is $3.75.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE PEERLESS

THE most obvious characteristic of the Peerless is its irreproachable beauty—its grace of line and its perfection of finish. Yet the beauty of the Peerless is but a subordinate aim of its makers.

Safety is the first essential, comfort is the second; and not until these imperative qualities have been achieved in the highest possible degree is there any deliberate attention to appearances.

The beauty of the Peerless therefore has this significance: It is the final expression of that type of absolutely faithful construction that insists on fundamentals first—and by so doing evolves naturally into the beauty of form that results from correct design, the best materials, deliberate manufacture and thorough maturity of every detail.

The Summer Wardrobe

Is there a problem more trying than the selection of summer clothes at a time when every one else is busy planning outings for the season? Yet work as one can in the early spring and during the first days of summer many necessary items remain unprovided until the last moment.

That simple morning frock, the light wrap which ought to replace the heavy coat for motoring through the day's heat, the cool porch dress for summer afternoons and the casino, the light airy demi toilette for the evening hop or bridge, what looks a sufficiency in spring buying proves far too meager when pressed into service at summer hotel or country home.

heavy satin damask, interspersed with exquisitely carved and inlaid tables, line the room on both sides, while the entire middle space is left vacant to show to advantage the beauty of the highly polished floor.

The private apartments are in another wing facing the court of honor, and are entered through one of the fifteenth-century towers. A small Gothic doorway of handsomely carved wood opens directly upon a spiral staircase, reconstructed in white stone by the father of the present duke. This stairway is indeed marvelously built; each step is made of a single piece of stone cut in one with the carved column around which the stair winds. At the top a narrow passageway leads to the small reception-room, the walls of which are covered with tooled leather colored in dull blue and gold—a perfect setting for the gilded furniture and the creamy stone fireplace.

Adjoining this room is the bedchamber, hung and furnished with blue satin damask. Nothing in the room has been changed since the days of its famous owner; in fact, these apartments are not even used by the present family, but are preserved simply for their historic value. The last occupant was Charles X, who spent the night at this château after his abdication from the throne of France in 1830.

The court of honor is reached through the main entrance, and is laid out as a charming terrace garden. There are little, pebbly paths outlined by closely clipped yew hedges, conventional French flower-beds, and marble urns which, like sentries on duty, stand in rigid lines along the outer edge with their scarlet masses of geraniums waving like banners in the summer breeze. At the foot of the terrace stone steps lead down to the river, which forms a great, shining avenue leading away to the distant ruins of the aqueduct. This great water-way was built by Louis XIV to conduct water to his fairy palace at Versailles. At the steps the river divides and flows around the château between the massive, ivy-covered walls of the moat. A pleasant, wooded walk runs along the bank of the river on both sides. The river in its windings in and out is crossed by thirty-two bridges, so that the beautiful park is turned into a miniature rustic Venice.

The aqueduct ruins are a monument to a whim of Louis XIV

WHAT THEY READ

AMERICAN cities, their atmosphere and topography, are not to be discovered in the pages of American fiction. Paris, of course, lives almost as vividly in French romance as in the experience of the every-day Parisian. Hugo, Balzac, Dumas, and a host of earlier and later writers, great and small, have put the physical and spiritual Paris into fiction with a wealth of detail that makes the town in its historic phases a genuine entity for thousands of readers. Even strangers, fascinated with that capital of picturesque history and aspect, have interpreted it into their fiction, sometimes with realistic effect, as witness the wintry old Paris in Stevenson's "A Lodging for the Night." As to London, one could almost map the city from the pages of English fiction. Furthermore, English novelists have put into their books the aspects and atmosphere of such subordinate capitals as Edinburgh and Dublin, and even of such smaller provincial towns as Rochester, Bath, and Dover. We all know Mayfair from a hundred novels, and Russell Square belongs to every reader of English fiction as part of the familiar world which he inhabits.

No American city lives thus within the covers of books. Hundreds of novels have dealt with New York, but urban quarters in this city are not the common property of novel readers. Washington Square of fifty years ago has a sort of life in an early novel of Henry James, but nobody knows Gramercy Park and Stuyvesant Square from the pages of the novelists. Colonial New York has found a place in some of the native fiction, but all traces of the town as it then was have so vanished in the process of rebuilding that the reader has no means of verifying the city of fiction by reference to the city of fact. No vast and busy pile of buildings survives to us from other centuries, rich with the memory of men's comings and goings, through long generations. The face of the city changes so rapidly that nobody has the skill to render it permanent in fiction.

There are some smaller American cities that retain more of their past than survives of New York's, as Philadelphia and Boston, New Orleans and Charleston, but the novelists have seldom deliberately set themselves to reproduce the topography of a particular urban era in any of these cities. A recent minutely studied and immensely detailed novel of Philadelphia in the period between 1860 and 1875 leaves the reader with no lively impression of streets and houses, social custom or public feeling. Owen Wister put something of moribund Charleston's old rose-jar aroma into an overrated novel, and Cable has gilded New Orleans of the last generation with the beams of romance, but no novel reader has acquired from reading these books a New Orleans or a Charleston of his very own. It is only by accompanying many a hero and heroine through the labyrinth of a strange city's streets that one comes in time to feel that the worn pavements and the smooth doorsills are dear and familiar.

Boston has so much of its past intact, and so distinguished a topography, that it should have found a place as the city of dreams in the imagination of many novel readers, but it has reached no such honor in the universal gazetteer of romance. No city has a more loyal body of cultivated citizens, but when a Bostonian attempts to put the city into fiction he seldom achieves detachment sufficient to save his attempt from the fatal touch of provincialism. Mrs. Anna Coleman Ladd's novel, "The Candid Adventurer," has the atmosphere of Boston in the twentieth century, and Mrs. Ladd is not provincial. She suffers her artist-hero to laugh in the face of local respectability, and to see the city with his own eyes, not with the eyes of a loyal tradition. Such treatment of Boston in American fiction has rare audacity. Mr. Howells never fully achieved it, and the native novelists, such as Judge Grant, rarely attempt anything beyond the interpretation of the local spirit as embodied in respectable folk of the old native stock. In such fiction Boston appears truly not as a place, but as a state of mind.

Four or five of the older American cities have topographical bits that should survive in native fiction. There are unspoiled parts of New York's old West Side that seem made to the hand of the romancer. Beacon Hill should be as familiar to the readers of American fiction as the Inns of Court and London's fashionable West End to the readers of English novels from the days of Fanny Burney to those of current British novelists. Spruce Street, above Independence Square, should be a familiar quarter in the fiction of Philadelphia, and the old hotels of Baltimore, the wharves and the fine urban quarter within the shadow of the Washington monument should form the background of many a novel dealing with the social life of Maryland. Thus far, however, few writers have proved capable of seizing strongly, and representing vividly the familiar streets and houses of our American cities.

To be sure, no American city can ever have for this country as a whole the tremendous significance that, for Englishmen and Frenchmen, attaches to such old capitals as London and Paris. Paris has stood for the national life as a whole through all the centuries since it ceased to be merely the Lutetia, or Mudtown, of the Parisii, and London has been for more than a thousand years the political workshop, the social and intellectual center of the English people. New York, Boston, Baltimore have no such past. We have almost fifty civic capitals, and we have no city that all readers know as Frenchmen know Paris, and Englishmen, London. New York, however, is familiarly known to thrice as many persons as knew London of the eighteenth century, and even Boston has, in New England, a loyal clientèle of some millions, besides her many thousand exiled sons and daughters who live throughout the country. Novelists with a strong topographical sense and sufficient detachment to place them beyond and above mere local loyalty, will perhaps one day interpret American cities to themselves and to the country at large.

THE FRIENDS WHO LIVE IN BOOKS

THE CANDID ADVENTURER, by ANNA COLEMAN LADD, must be recognized, notwithstanding a trifle of indebtedness to William J. Locke, as a very happy and successful attempt at a romance of unusual quality. The essence of its entertainment lies in the fascinatingly whimsical painter, Jerome Leigh, a character that Mr. Locke would be proud to have created, and one that he certainly could never better, for Leigh is more of a genuinely flesh-and-blood reality than Mr. Locke's illusive and elusive young men. Indeed, Leigh is one of the best men in recent fiction. As to the contrasted women of the book, Golda, the wondrous Polish child-woman, and Mrs. Osborn, the New England cosmopolitan, both live for Mrs. Ladd's readers, and every man of them will fall a little in love with each. For once we have a novel of Boston that achieves detachment and escapes provincialism. The author is really not afraid of "cold roast Boston," and she knows how to show it to itself with perfectly good-natured ridicule. The painter's notion, however, that he, the Italian population, and a few others can give Boston a joyous air, is a sad mistake. The wondrous beauty of the Charles River Basin and the good red town behind it, crowned with the bedimmed golden dome of the State House, is a happy accident, but not enough to give a Mediterranean tone to a city with a spring that never arrives, and a summer that seldom has three warm nights together. Boston aside, however, "The Candid Adventurer" is one of the most fascinating novels published in many a season. (Houghton Mifflin Company, $1.35 net.)

THE AMATEUR GENTLEMAN, by JEFFREY FARNOL, is a variant of the picaresque romance, though Mr. Farnol's picaro is not a rogue, nor is the story of his adventures told autobiographically. Mr. Farnol has placed his scenes in the days when George IV was still Prince of Wales, and his hero is the suddenly enriched son of a prize-fighter. By some miracle the youth is a gentleman by instinct and a fair scholar by training. Thus equipped with wealth, education, native good manners and good feeling, and the ambition to be a gentleman, he sets out on as wild a succession of adventures as the most ardent lover of sensational fiction could demand. Those who ask something more than improbable adventure and the false romance of a brutal and squalid period will wish that Mr. Farnol had turned his natural gifts toward the production of fiction more nearly realistic and sincere. The early picaresque romance in English was distinguished for its realism in the depiction of unfamiliar but not improbable adventures, but the picaro of to-day is apt to be a hero of almost magic power and charm. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co., $1.40 net.)

STELLA MARIS, by WILLIAM J. LOCKE, has more of tragedy than one is accustomed to expect of its author, and even more of pure extravagance than he has usually given his readers. The chief situation of the story is original, if extremely improbable, and Mr. Locke has worked it out consistently enough, so that, however one's common sense may revolt from the improbability of Stella's bringing up, one accepts without serious question the girl's attitude toward life as resulting from her isolation during the years of childhood, adolescence, and early womanhood. It is a good deal harder to accept the marriage of Stella's Great High Belovedest to the hideous creature who so nearly ruins his life, and the revolting character of the woman's career leaves upon the reader a sense of pain that many will hardly accept at the hands of Mr. Locke. The best of the book is the silent lesson it conveys of kindness and good will, and the imaginative touches contributed by Walter Herold to the fantastic world in which Stella lives. One need not be a merely matter-of-fact person to revolt somewhat from a good deal of the sentiment with which Stella is surrounded. (New York: John Lane Company, $1.35 net; postage, 12 cents.)

THE NEST, by ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK (Mrs. Basil De Selincourt), contains six rather longer "short stories" by a woman whose work has been likened to that of Edith Wharton, and who shares with that clever portrayer of American life the art of interesting us in the tale of psychologic significance. Mrs. Wharton, it should be said, gets nearer human realism in some of her stories dealing with plain New England folk than Mrs. De Selincourt seems capable of doing with her English men and women. In the story that gives title to this volume there is a vast amount of ingeniously contrived misunderstanding, but the author certainly does not manage to make the reader feel the poignancy of a situation that would have been poignant in real life. Again in "The White Pagoda" there is a deal of space occupied in telling a tale hardly worth telling, and one that would have drawn curses from the lips of Robert Louis Stevenson. "A Forsaken Temple" has more of genuine living interest, and, indeed, the motif is one that only a very extravagant writer would have wasted upon a short story. On the whole, one reads these undeniably finished bits of fiction with a growing hunger for something to happen, and a deep desire for the intrusion of some really vulgar or violent person who shall disturb the correct deportment and admirable diction of the author's impeccably well-bred folk. (New York: The Century Company, $1.25 net.)

ONE WOMAN'S LIFE, by ROBERT HERRICK, is not so much a well coordinated and consecutive novel, as a study of a single personality. If we may judge from a few words near the close of the book, Mr. Herrick intended to present his "one woman" as the example of a person who almost instinctively uses for her own purposes all with whom she comes in contact, though the notion will perhaps come as a surprise to a good many readers. Perhaps most of Mr. Herrick's readers will agree that he has done the adolescence and early maturity of his heroine better than her later life, but he has marred his work in places by the intrusion of the mere bachelor's

Susanna Cocroft's Facial Culture

(Physical Culture for the Face)

Seven years of study and experiment have enabled me to perfect my Facial Culture system. It does for the face what my Physical Culture has done for the figures of nearly 60,000 women. The skin of your face and throat should be as clear and unblemished as the skin of your body. My Facial Culture system restores the muscles, blood vessels and nerves of the face and neck to their natural condition and brings to your skin the health and youth that is yours.—Susanna Cocroft.

Make Your Own Room Your Beauty Parlor

Six to ten minutes a day of Susanna Cocroft's Facial Culture exercises in your own home will help you to accomplish more than by massage for an hour a day in a beauty parlor. These few minutes each day before your own mirror will enable you to devote the time taken up going to and from beauty parlors and spent in them to your social life—and will make you happy because of the restored facial charm that is yours. If you look older than you should it is because you are not co-operating with Nature.

The thousands of women who know Miss Cocroft's international reputation as a restorer of health and youth will not only be glad to hear of this new department in her work but will also be immediately confident that it will produce precisely the results promised.

You are as Young and Happy as You Look

And you can look as young and happy as you should be. Susanna Cocroft's Facial Culture overcomes tired eyes, wrinkles about them, pouches beneath them, crow's feet, drooping mouth corners, hard lines from nostrils to lips; thin, tight lips; colorless, drawn lips; sallow, freckled or discolored skin, and all the needless imperfections which add years to your looks. Follow Miss Cocroft's Facial Culture instructions, simple as they are, faithfully, and you will be delighted with the results.

Write Today for Full Information

Because Miss Cocroft must continue to give her personal supervision to her Physical Culture instructions, her Facial Culture system will be in the hands of Misses Grace L. Ballack and Mildred A. Albee, who have been associated with her for years, adequately qualifying them to direct this department.

At all times, however, Miss Cocroft's valuable advice will be available to you. Write today—now—for further particulars and for the names of those who have followed Susanna Cocroft's Facial Culture course and are glad they did.

interpretation of womanhood. Next to the "one woman," the best character in the book is the laundrywoman, though she also is necessarily incomplete from Mr. Herrick's consistent effort to show all his people only as they influence, help, or hinder, the development of the heroine. His conception of the leading character is excellent, and the notion of subordinating all else to her is almost original, but it must be said that the execution of the task seems to betray marks of haste. To have done the thing with something like perfection would have required long brooding and patient writing and re-writing. Those who read uncritically will follow the adventures of Millie with interest, and see in her a creature of unusual charm, and of unalloyed femininity, as men, and especially bachelors, conceive femininity. (New York: The Macmillan Company, $1.35 net.)

THE WOMAN IN BLACK, by EDMUND C. BENTLEY, chief editorial writer of the London Telegraph, and sufficiently intimate with Mr. Chesterton to dedicate the book to him as a lifelong friend, is a well-written and highly ingenious tale of criminal mystery. Let no one, however, be deceived into believing the title of Mr. Bentley's book properly indicative of its leading motif. The woman in black who figures in the title and upon the effective cover carton is not a mysterious person; the mystery of the tale is created by the devilish ingenuity of one who disappears from it very early, whose death, indeed, is announced in the very first chapter. Mr. Bentley is a clever person, but his exceedingly creditable attempt at a tale of crime and mystery falls far short of the excellence in that kind of fiction attained by Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. Ingenuity based upon a high degree of improbability is the chief merit of Mr. Bentley's book. Another distinguished merit is its restrained style, while yet another is the absence of extravagance in his characters, who are mainly just human beings, "uncommonly like you." "The Woman in Black" is a good story that need not make cold chills run down the back of those who read it after nightfall. (New York: The Century Company, $1.25 net.)

CONCERT PITCH, by FRANK DANBY, shows Mrs. Frankau in somewhat the same fine mood that enabled her to write the idyllic story of low life in London entitled "The Heart of a Child." In "Concert Pitch" she has another idyllic figure, this time a young girl whom an ambitious stepmother is determined to marry to a roué with the prospect of a dukedom. She makes a far different and extremely unhappy marriage, but retrieves her marital fortunes through a tragedy growing out of a husband's jealousy. The girl is well done, and she makes no very serious demands upon the credulity of the reader. Her faithful though rejected lover is that somewhat rare thing in current British fiction, a nobleman with a sound heart and a clear head. The ambitious stepmother is a repulsive character well conveyed, and the weak brother of the heroine is redeemed from utter selfishness by his final loyalty to his sister. The musical genius of the book is done with care and convincing effect, while the great doctor is a trump. (New York: The Macmillan Company, $1.35 net.)

STEPHEN MARCH'S WAY, by HARRY HERBERT KNIBBS, is another of its author's cleverly executed tales of the timber lands. Those readers who find themselves repelled by the rather grotesque and trying dialect of the opening chapter are assured, for their comfort, that Mr. Knibbs does not make this dialect the vehicle of communication throughout the book. He soon brings the speech of his characters within the comprehension of ears polite, though he gives us throughout little touches of French-Canadian English with a mixture of patois. As to the characters, plot, and incidents of the story, they put no great strain upon credulity, though the lovers are surely a bit too refined for their origin and surroundings. Considered as a whole, the book suggests somewhat an apprenticeship to Stewart Edward White by one who attempts to avoid the direct methods that constitute the peculiar strength of the exemplar. (New York and Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company, $1.25 net.)

VEILED WOMEN, by MARMADUKE PICKTHALL, pictures harem life in the days just before and long after the Egyptian national movement of Arabi Pasha. The book is less a novel than a document written for the purpose above indicated, though it has a continuous thread of story and some extremely amusing scenes, as those of the visit to Paris, where the Egyptians, men and women alike, are much scandalized at Frankish practices. Mr. Pickthall apparently writes from an intimate acquaintance with his subject, and he has produced a curiously instructive and entertaining volume. (New York: Duffield & Co., $1.25 net.)

CONCERNING WOMEN

RAHEL VARNHAGEN, A PORTRAIT, by ELLEN KEY, will present for the first time to many readers one of the most brilliant women that Europe has known. Miss Key's account of Rahel is probably a very different story from that which would be told of her by a rigid modern scientific investigator of her character and career as revealed by her letters and the testimony of her contemporaries, but doubtless Miss Key's sympathetic interpretation of a woman somewhat resembling her is in many points nearer the truth than that of any mere cold psychologist could be. Nevertheless, Miss Key seems to have neglected the element of excessive introspection, and extreme individualism, not to say egotism, which plainly appear in the lovely and fascinating Rahel. Nietzsche, to whom Miss Key compares Rahel, was the apostle of an individualism driven to the verge of anarchism, and it was natural enough that he should die in a madhouse. He was a vastly helpful philosopher for a civilization caught in the strangling coils of state socialism, but, like all extreme egotists, he was inevitably pointed toward the madness that overtook him. Rahel was an exquisite creature of sweetness and light, one who should have developed in an atmosphere of love and freedom, but who was cruelly imprisoned during her youth in a home tyrannically ruled by a narrow and unsympathetic father, to whose cruelties a dull and weak wife could offer no effective opposition. What wonder that this woman of the noblest possibilities was driven to the extremes of self-assertion, to an unwholesome introspection? The marvel is that she saved so much from the wreck, that the astonishing wealth of her nature was not altogether sacrificed upon the hideous altar of the ancient Jewish patriarchy. Naturally enough, her earlier love affairs brought her cruel unhappiness. In each case the man was unworthy, and she was especially fortunate that she did not wed her Spanish lover. By a sort of miracle her marriage late in life to a man her junior, and intellectually her inferior, was happy, since he was always able to

The Corset Which Fits Your Figure as a Soft Glove Fits Your Hand

La Resista

CORSETS

CAN you imagine a glove made of heavy canvas or a slipper lined with iron? You would not wear them a moment—neither will you wear an old-fashioned corset one hour after trying the new La Resista models for Spring and Summer, 1913.

When You Try On

a La Resista Corset you notice first its wonderful flexibility. It fits your figure exactly as a soft glove fits your hand—yielding to every movement, but clasping the figure firmly and never losing its long, supple, youthful lines. The secret lies in "Spirabone"—the patented elastic boning that every other corset manufacturer would use had he thought of it before we did.

And When You Try Your Gown

over the La Resista Corset, it fits better than ever before. You will have the graceful, sweeping lines of the so-called "uncorseted effect." Yet support will not be lacking, and there will be none of the careless, badly gowned look given by the boneless corsets which other manufacturers are trying to persuade you to wear. "Spirabone" gives the long, hipless lines that are demanded by fashion to-day. Remember, it is only to be found in genuine La Resista Corsets—there are no satisfactory substitutes.

Every gown, from the superb Doucet model shown in this photograph to the simplest summer tub frock, fits perfectly over a flexible La Resista Corset.

Spirabone Is As Flexible

as the celebrated rapiers once made in Ferrara. It can be laid end to end without buckling or breaking, not once but a hundred times. Therefore a La Resista Corset will outwear any corset that depends for flexibility upon flat steel bones of the ordinary type.

For All Outdoor Uses

La Resista Corsets are a necessity. Let your Summer wardrobe include at least four of them; one for outdoor sports, two for everyday wear, and one with our special extension back, Style 931, to wear under the thin Summer gowns that otherwise show an ugly line where the old-fashioned corset ends.

Fifty La Resista Models

are now on review at the best shops. Prices range from $25 downwards, with several exceptionally good models at $5 and $2.50. If you do not easily find them, let us send our catalogue and direct you to the nearest dealer—or we will supply you direct. In New York, call at our showrooms opposite the Waldorf to be fitted by expert designers. We study your individual needs, and provide you with the models best adapted for wear with the wardrobe you have chosen for this summer. Our wide range of models makes selection easy.

Unless you already know where to find La Resista Corsets, send a post-card to-day for the new La Resista Catalogue. By following its suggestions you will be both correctly and comfortably corseted this summer.

WOMEN AS WORLD BUILDERS: STUDIES IN MODERN FEMINISM, by FLOYD DELL, bristles with a cheap and silly cleverness for which the best of the women whom he uses by way of illustration will hardly thank the champion of their cause. Ellen Key, and Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Dreier Robins, and the much misunderstood if somewhat hysterical Emma Goldman are likely to smile at their somewhat absurd interpreter, and those who read Mr. Dell's hectic smartness, manifestly intended to shock conventional folk, will almost welcome the somewhat pedestrian philosophizing of Mr. Salmon. (Chicago: Forbes & Co., 75 cents.)

THE MAN AND THE WOMAN: STUDIES IN HUMAN LIFE, by ARTHUR A. SALMON, represents the antipodes in style and matter of Mr. Dell's book. Mr. Salmon takes the old-fashioned view of human relations, and presents his opinions without the glaring aid of linguistic pyrotechnics. Women of to-day will hardly find Mr. Salmon's studies satisfying, and will ask something vastly different, however much their native wisdom may lead them to smile at Mr. Dell's smartness. (Chicago: Forbes & Co., 75 cents net.)

THE LOVE-SEEKER: A SENTIMENTAL HANDBOOK, by MAUD CHURTON BRADY, is written for the longitude of Greenwich rather than for that of Washington, but it will be found none the less entertaining on that account. The author is neither the "new woman" nor the old, but something of both. It is easy to guess from a few guarded hints dropped in her entertaining and significant little book that she sympathizes with a good deal of current radical thought upon the marriage question, but her private position seems to be nearer to that of Ellen Key than to that of the versatile Mrs. Gilman. Her wise discussion of "sham love" seems to echo the sad wisdom of Burns's, "But och! it hardens a' within, and petrifies the feeling!" American girls will smile at some of the author's recipes for catching a husband, but may learn something from her as to the means of retaining the fish, once caught and landed. (New York: Sturgis & Walton Company, $1.25 net.)

PLAYS AND POEMS

IRISH PLAYS AND PLAYWRIGHTS, by CORNELIUS WEYGANDT, undertakes in about 300 pages to discuss sympathetically, but without mere blind enthusiasm, the interesting literary movement strongly drawn to the attention of the American theatre-going public by the recent visits of the Irish players. Professor Weygandt discusses the "Celtic Renaissance," deals rapidly with the history of the Dublin players and their plays, and then goes on to discuss the group of playwrights who have contributed to this new and interesting stage. He even goes beyond the mere dramatic side of the Irish literary movement, for he gives an impressive chapter mainly to the lyric poetry of G. W. Russell, and frankly deplores Mr. Yeats's desertion of lyric for dramatic writing. George Moore, who is certainly not eminent as a dramatist, he treats at some length, calling him the most distinguished living English novelist, an opinion hardly justified, at least while Mr. Hardy is alive, by even so notable a masterpiece as "Esther Waters." Synge is amply treated, and the discussion of that remarkable man will be most welcome to a generation of readers eager to know more of one who could create so rare a thing as "The Playboy of the Western World." There is a chapter on the younger dramatist, and a discussion of William Sharp in his own person and as Fiona Macleod, which is distinguished for sanity and restraint, though it is an even less justifiable intrusion in a book of this title than the paper on G. W. Russell. All who wish to know what a highly discriminating critic thinks of Irish plays and playwrights, and to make acquaintance with the movement that has evolved them, owe Professor Weygandt a debt of gratitude, and the debt is not lessened by the overplus involved in the discussion of William Sharp and the purely lyric Irishmen. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company, $2 net.)

THE MUSE IN EXILE: POEMS, by WILLIAM WATSON, shows the poet in rebelliously defiant mood facing a world that he thinks almost deaf to poetry. Mr. Watson's new volume attempts in its preface and its prose essay on "The Poet's Place in the Scheme of Life," as well as in the body of accompanying verse, to justify the existence of those who express their feelings, and their more impassioned thoughts in metered language. An amusing little anachronism of the preface speaks of the "rust-eaten pens" of the twelfth-century analysts, a phrase that shows the poet is quite forgetting that the goose-quill is considerably older than Joseph Gillotte's invention. The essay is an able brief for the poet, though a little marred, one must think, by an unkind phrase aimed at Mr. Kipling. He is to be thanked, however, for another phrase recalling Milton's noble saying, that poetry should be "simple, sensuous, passionate." The poet's task, thinks Mr. Watson, is "to see the world through a kind of ecstasy; to lighten and emphasize its lineaments, though without distorting them; to see vividly, paint nobly, and feel romantically, whatever in this universe is to be seen and felt and painted." He expects that the next twenty years will give the poet a wider audience, and hints at the coming decadence of the novel as a mode of literary expression. The poems that occupy about two-thirds of Mr. Watson's 116 pages show him, as always, master of verse and of phrase, a passionately hard hitter for the causes he has at heart, and now and then a majestic musician with the voice of our noble, elder poetic days. Among the best of these poems are those entitled "Science and Nature," "Hymn for a Progressive People," a poem of really majestic feeling and movement, and "Summer's Overthrow." The poem attacking the Turk and that championing Ulster have impressive passion and much spirit. (New York: John Lane Company, $1.25.)

THE ELECTRIC GLIDES INTO FAVOR

THE electric car, a vehicle which has heretofore made its appeal especially to women since it is easy to start, is simple of control, and silent in operation, now is finding great favor in the opinion of the man of the family because of its comparative cheapness. With the improvements in batteries and motors which are conducive to more efficient storage and application of power, come gradual but marked reductions in the electric-charging rate. Another great factor in the case is the constantly increasing price of fuel for the gasoline car, which has already added from twenty-five to fifty per cent. to the cost of its operation. It is hardly probable that the increase in the cost of gasoline will ever seriously affect the sales of gasoline cars, for it is a subject to which all of the manufacturers are giving the most careful consideration. It is, therefore, quite probable that their efforts either to produce a substitute for the now precious fuel or to lower the cost of its production will be successful. In the meantime, the electric is entering a new field of popularity from which it can never be banished, no matter how alluringly low may be the eventual cost of running its "big brother."

NEWS FOR THE MOTOR WORLD

It is therefore with unusual interest that the motoring world has received the announcement of a number of small details and refinements which are to be found on the newest models in electric pleasure cars. This car is very simply controlled—the levers and pedals are so arranged that it may be brought to a stop almost instantly, and there is but little possibility that, even under the stress of an emergency, the operator may manipulate the wrong lever. The two pedals which project from the floor boards in front of the driver operate two powerful, separate brakes, and an upright lever conveniently placed at the left controls the speed of the car. A push on the pedals and a pull on the lever will bring the car to a stop as quickly as is safe for the occupants, and as it is natural to brace the feet before an expected jolt, the action of throwing off the power and of applying the brakes becomes almost automatic. The control of many electrics is modeled after a similar design, but the one in question is unique in that the reverse is not obtained by the continued backward pull on the side lever, but is engaged by moving it to the side. This prevents the danger of throwing the lever on into reverse when it is intended only to cut off the power, and it also prevents a shock to the mechanism.

A SURE GUIDE

The steering lever is designed to be operated with the right hand, and is so constructed that by no possibility can the swaying of the body bind the rods so that the guidance of the car is rendered difficult. It occasionally happens with many of the older styles of electrics that, when a severe jolt is encountered, the body is thrown sideways, thus preventing the free action of the steering rod that passes through the floor. This is now avoided by fastening both of the brackets which support the steering rods to the body of the machine, instead of securing one of them to the frame, as heretofore was the case.

FOR THE SAKE OF APPEARANCES

An exceedingly smooth and neat appearance is given to the body of this car by using a single line of bead, or molding, to outline the doors and windows, instead of the double molding which is generally employed. With the exception of the front window, all the windows are made without sashes, and those which can be lowered have the pockets provided with a felt packing. The forward and end windows are of the "D" shape, and the glass front of the body is provided with a tilting portion which corresponds to a "rain vision" windshield. By means of a hinge and a brace that holds the lower portion at any desired angle, a clear view of the road ahead is obtained which will not be interfered with by the wet or cloudy glass of the shield. The forward projection of the glass serves as a sort of hood, and very effectually prevents the rain from being driven into the interior of the car.

Baking 300,000 Meals Daily

Here's the result of baking beans such as no one else has baked.

Our chefs, on the average, daily prepare 300,000 meals of Van Camp's.

Every month in this magazine we tell you about them. And sometime a dish of Van Camp's is bound to appear on your table.

Then we are done.

Van Camp's themselves will win you and hold you if you only give them a chance.

Van Camp's
BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE
PORK AND BEANS
"The National Dish"

Here are beans, Mrs. Housewife, which come to your table with all the fresh oven flavor.

Some of the ablest chefs have spent years and years in bringing the dish to perfection.

The beans we use are picked out by hand. The tomatoes are all vine-ripened.

The baking is done by super-heated steam, which doesn't touch the beans.

Thus the beans come to you nutlike, mealy and whole—none crisped, none broken. And the luscious sauce, which is baked with the beans, permeates every atom.

If you served twenty kinds of baked beans, the folks at your table could, with one taste, pick Van Camp's. We have tried this.

If Van Camp's stand out that way—because of their excellence—don't you think it pays to get them?

A million women do.

An outdoor sleeping-room is one of the healthful possibilities of a roof

GARDENS in the AIR

MOST city dwellers who long to transplant some of the country into their city houses content themselves with a few window-boxes or plants in pots and jardinières, when they might have real gardens of considerable area in the place where air and light are most bountiful—on the roof. This was the case with me until I beheld a garden on the roof of a large hotel. All at once the few plants I owned seemed poor and insignificant, and I was inspired to ascend to my own roof to see what could be done. It was discouragingly glaring and desolate. But I knew that the roof received more sunshine and air than I could ever hope to coax into my open window, and so when the first spring days came, I determined to make a garden on my housetop.

My roof is the size of that of the ordinary city house—about thirty by eighty feet. It was necessary first to do away with the tin roofing, both for the sake of appearances and for comfort. So I had shale tile laid over the tin, then a gray-green tile to harmonize with the other improvements. The question of making the roof safe was important as there were several children in my family. So I arranged to have an iron railing, about four feet high, erected at the front and back. At the sides of the roof I had built a parapet about five feet high. It was necessary to have the walls as well as the skylights and other projections above the surface of the roof flashed with copper. These improvements completely enclosed the roof and afforded entire privacy.

The background ready, I began to think about furnishings. First I had an arch built. From each parapet was built out a short dividing wall, about four feet high and two feet thick, to the ends of which the posts of the arch were fastened. The arch itself consisted of a couple of posts nailed to the ends of the dividing wall. From top to bottom of these, laths were nailed to give the effect of a ladder. Other such ladders were used to complete the V-shaped top of the arch. In order that a hammock might be safe and sheltered from the sun, I had built a platform with posts at each end, to which was attached an awning. The problem of a sleeping-balcony was solved by a tall lattice covered with an awning. Beneath this I put a rug and a couch with some pillows.

As I wanted to forget entirely that my garden was on a city roof, I had lattice-work built along the brick parapets, so that they were completely hidden. The chimneys were latticed with a wire-mesh to within an inch of the top, and a tall, square lattice was placed around the smokestacks. Then all the woodwork was given a coat of gray-green paint to harmonize with the tiling.

MAKING THE GARDEN

Before the carpentering was started I had ordered a cold-frame, so as to have a few plants for transplanting by the time the garden was ready. It was necessary to select hardy annuals, as fragile and

Suppose This Dish Met You

Suppose you came down to breakfast and wanted something extra nice. And you found at your plate a dish like this—either Puffed Rice or Puffed Wheat.

Porous, brown grains—eight times normal size—made to taste like toasted nuts.

Ready to serve with sugar and cream. Ready to mix with your berries.

A million people this morning, in all probability, found that on their breakfast tables. We are making forty million dishes monthly to supply the lovers of these foods.

If you served something else, the folks at your table found nothing quite so good.

For these foods can't be imitated. Their texture comes through a steam explosion. Their flavor is due to terrific heat.

There is no other way known to make cereal foods as delightful as these Puffed Grains.

Puffed Wheat, 10c *Except in

Puffed Rice, 15c

Here's another way of serving. Float the grains like crackers in a bowl of milk.

They are thin and crisp and porous. At a touch of the teeth the grains will crush into almond-flavored granules.

You get whole-grain wafers, made more digestible than any other process makes them.

Or use them where nut-meats taste good. Use them in candy making, or as garnish to ice cream.

These are cereal confections. Yet they are cheap enough to be served as liberally as other cereal foods.

GARDENS IN THE AIR

shade-loving plants were out of the question in that unprotected spot. I decided on scarlet sage, petunias, pansies, China asters, white tanzy, everlasting, nasturtiums, candytuft, marigolds, sanvitalia, and sweet alyssum. At one corner of the bed I planted the pansy seeds, and next, the nasturtiums. As these are both coarse, I scattered them evenly over the surface, and covered them slightly with soil shaken through a sieve. The very small seeds, such as petunias, it was necessary to scatter evenly but not to cover with soil. Then I placed a glass frame over the box. This frame was removed for ten minutes each day so that the fresh air could reach the soil, and I took great care that the latter should not become hard through lack of moisture. Even when there was no indication that the soil was dry, I sprinkled it with lukewarm water. A thermometer was kept in the bed, and when the temperature dropped below 60 degrees F., I covered the glass with a piece of sailcloth. It was necessary to keep this cloth on every night until warm weather came. When the plants were well up, I removed the glass entirely on warm days so that contact with the air would harden them. It was not long before I noticed in a few of the seedlings a tendency to rot off near the soil. This proved to be a common disease, and it was wholly cured by shaking a little sulphur about the young plants.

Then I bought fifty geranium slips from the florist. Of course, I could have bought the flowers already in bloom, but I preferred to have the joy of planting all my flowers. I decided that the conventional window-boxes would answer very well for my flower-beds. These can be made in any desired shape and size, so I had a number of boxes made, about three feet long and one foot in both width and depth. These were placed along the top of the parapets. For the floor of the roof, by the walls, I had other boxes, slightly deeper, made for ferns and shrubs. As in the case of those made previously, holes were bored in the bottom for drainage.

A COLOR SCHEME FOR A ROOF

My plan was to have the color scheme of my garden red and white, with perhaps a dash of yellow. I realized that with the limited space at my disposal I could not be too cautious about the colors. A riot of red, yellow, and purple may be enchanting in a spacious, old-fashioned garden in the country, but on a roof it is out of place. So in the cold frame were planted only white flowers, with the exception of the yellow pansies and nasturtiums. The geraniums were scarlet and white.

When the cuttings were well rooted, on the first dry day each was removed carefully with a case knife and transplanted into the boxes. As the cuttings have no soil about the roots, a hole was dug large enough for the cuttings to spread out before being covered with soil. First the small plants were removed, very carefully, so as not to break any of the roots while resetting them in the boxes. The holes dug were half-filled with water, and dry earth was sprinkled all around the stem above. The reason for the mud at the base is to keep the roots moist; but no more water is required, as the air must have a chance to penetrate through the soil.

Perhaps the problem of watering is the most important of all for the roof-gardener to bear in mind. Too little water will cause the roots to dry up from lack of moisture, and excessive watering generally decays the roots. To determine when the plants need water, test the soil by taking a little in the hand. If it breaks into small particles, and slips easily through the fingers, water is needed immediately. The plants should never be watered in a hot sun, as this tends to cake the soil and to prevent the air from penetrating to the roots. Early forenoon or late afternoon is the best time. Nothing but clear water with the chill taken off should be used.

I purchased some sword ferns and put them in boxes where they would receive the least sunlight. The soil was kept always moist. If the ferns are placed in the sunlight and kept too wet they will become yellow. A hedge of summer cypress was made to fill the space in front of the railing. This hedge has a quick growth. Honeysuckle and climbing roses covered all the lattices, and German and English ivy, trailing vinca, and a gray-green vine called "the dusty miller" were planted in all the boxes.

The garden at last was ready for wicker chairs and hammocks, rustic benches and tables. My roof-garden was a success, and at the cost of about $300, including the tiling and the flashing of the walls and projections with copper.

PARIS VOGUE POINTS

THE popularity of the cobwebby blouse of unlined lace, net, or chiffon has produced a twin garment called a "dessous blouse." It is a fitting name, for although in reality but a glorified form of corset-cover, this garment is made in any of the materials which are as a rule employed for the creation of the most elaborate bodices. Chiffon, voile, silk, and batiste with insets of lace, are among the favorite models, while many others are made entirely of pointe de Venise, Valenciennes, or combinations of Irish and filet. Flesh-colored chiffon trimmed with creamy Malines lace is also a combination which is very popular and which is exceedingly effective when worn under a blouse of dead white or cream net. It is usual to place a piece of wide beading just below the line of the bust, and through this beading is run satin ribbon in the color of the dress, or in some shade which harmonizes with it. At the Worth opening several manikins wore these corsets beneath their net blouses. In some cases satin ribbon six or eight inches in width was draped about the bust, and so arranged as to form either a yokeless, sleeveless bolero or a high-bodice girdle. The shoulder straps may be of a very thin, filmy lace so that they are practically invisible, or they may be of narrow, satin ribbon.

THE "DESSOUS BLOUSE"

A dainty model shown by one of the Paris shops is made of a single piece of allover Valenciennes lace cut straight like a band. The top edge is scalloped and edged with a full ruching of narrow lace. Narrow, white satin ribbon holds this waist in place over the shoulders, and gives a square line to the neck opening. The waist opens in the back under a concealed flap, and is finished just at the waist-line by a tiny facing of lace. Price, 9 francs 90 centimes.

A more elaborate model is of thin batiste with insets of serpentine Valenciennes lace about two inches wide which run in parallel lines and are separated by inch-wide groups of pinhead tucks. The shoulder straps are of lace insertion. Just above the top line of lace is a two-inch-wide piece of pale yellow satin ribbon which ties in a crush bow directly in the middle of the front. This model sells for 21 francs.

A very rich and elaborate underwaist shown at this same shop is made entirely of pointe de Venise and Honiton insertions with the thinnest of net foundations. Price, 95 francs.

What is called a "simulé" lace is a new material well adapted to the making of these novel under-blouses. Although not washable, it is easily dry-cleaned, and its filminess does not keep it from being durable. The groundwork of the lace is a thin silk voile or mousseline, and the indistinct patterns, which resemble those of shadow lace, are worked upon it in a single thread of mercerized cotton. This lace, or brocaded voile, is wide—nearly forty inches—and is made in white, in flesh-color, or in pale blue. It sells for 2 francs 90 centimes a yard.

The sketch at the top of the page shows a distinctly Parisian matinée. It is made of flesh-colored chiffon and veiled with a round-meshed, cream net. Made surplice, it opens at the side and is finished by a long, shawl collar of chiffon trimmed with plaited ruffles. Semi-circular motifs of Malines lace outline the bottom, edge the short sleeves, and border the drapery of the front. These motifs also run over each shoulder and continue diagonally across the little skirt at the right side of the front. A bow of double-faced pink satin ribbon runs through loops covered with heavy buttonhole twist and fastens the matinée at an empire line. Price, 110 francs.

From sheer collar to plaited chiffon skirt this negligee is unmistakably Parisian

THE FRILLY COLLAR

ed net ruffles, which are finished with a picot edge and a delicate scroll-work embroidery stitch. The collar itself is of plain net, cut high in the back and sloping toward the front. It is boned to stand erect and close to the neck, but the bones are transparent. At the bottom is a narrow, tucked band of net which is joined by the shaped ends of the tie. The tie, like the collar, is made of plain net, and trimmed with net ruchings. The tie-ends should be arranged in a loose knot, or caught by a bar pin in a semi-fichu drapery. Price, 32 francs.

In the sketch at the lower right is shown one of the new chains for longnons. It is made of platinum-finished silver and set with tiny pearls. The slender, oval motifs are joined by a single platinum thread. Small pearls are hung in the delicate platinum midway the half-inch space between these motifs. This chain is quite a wonderful copy of a rue de la Paix model, and it sells for 70 francs.

The silhouette pin is one of several original novelties which are now making their debut on the rue de la Paix. This pin consists of an oval, platinum brooch designed in a similar pattern to the square mesh weave of filet lace, and mounted on black velvet. In the center of the pin is the kneeling figure of a cupid with his bow and arrow. The figure is formed by the cutting away of the platinum threads so as to show only the black velvet. It is thrown into high relief by the outline of the platinum around the open space, and the effect of a silhouette cut out in black paper and placed on a white background is very strikingly reproduced. The silhouette pin with the cupid motif is replacing the flower motifs in diamonds which formed the center of the brooch pins so popular during the past winter.

The frilly collar is the final touch to the toilette

A longnon chain which originated in the rue de la Paix

MOORE'S Floral Dry Shampoo

Is the Highest in Price Because it is the Highest in Quality

Shampooing the hair is an exquisite luxury, no matter what shampooing material you use.

But shampooing with Moore's Floral Dry Shampoo is a revelation.

As fragrant as a breath of Spring, as fresh as new-mown hay, Moore's Floral Dry Shampoo is an article of distinction in the toilet.

After a shampoo with it your scalp breathes, you feel refreshed, youthified. The charming scent of the rare flowers used in compounding Moore's Floral Dry Shampoo lingers in your nostrils.

In spite of the fact that the exclusive ingredients of Floral Shampoo compel a price higher than any on the market—we can assure you that in buying Moore's Floral Dry Shampoo you are getting the best value in head cleansers.

Moore's Floral leaves the hair glossy and clean to the roots, it invigorates the scalp and works with the natural oils so necessary to hair and head-health.

We have spared neither price nor pains in procuring the very best and finest possible ingredients for our shampoo. When we say that Floral Shampoo is Absolutely Pure we mean it, because we select the materials with painstaking care, supervise the molding and mixing of them and critically inspect each box before it leaves our factory.

We started with the determination to make the highest grade shampoo on the market, and we have succeeded.

You will agree with us, once you are acquainted with the lingering, lasting delights of Moore's Floral Dry Shampoo.

Higher in price because higher in quality.

Those who use Moore's Floral Dry Shampoo once are never satisfied with any other. This shampoo must positively be used without soap and water.

For sale by all first-class dealers, or sent postpaid for $1. Money returned if you are in any way dissatisfied.

WHITE ECONOMY

Is Actual Economy

THE small bore, long stroke White Engine introduced actual engine economy in gasoline and oil, into this country nearly four years ago.

Now that the need for economy is becoming absolutely necessary, White supremacy in the efficiency of its simple engine is recognized. And White economy goes farther. It includes in its scope wear, repair and tire cost.

Proportions of weight, engine power, and wheel base are carefully balanced to meet the requirements for which each model is specifically built. Add to this the wonderfully few parts in White Cars, and the care with which every piece of material is selected and finished, and White supremacy is acknowledged and White economy is the result.

T

A DISCOVERY of the nineteenth century that still enchants the twentieth is that a spade is a spade. Plain truth in commerce (where the newspapers prove, or try to prove, there is more art than fidelity) deserves a pedestal position from which to look down upon its brother of the varnished variety. In art its value is questionable. Prove that a spade is a spade and you may earn the admiration of the blind, but you will not create a work of art. The realists and their realism are in a false position. Art, without honesty, can not live; but truth, told without bias, gives no reason for the existence of art. The camera has proved that incontrovertibly. A painting, like a book, must give the impression which the painter secured from the face of Truth, and not be merely a reproduction of Truth. The reason for this is that Truth may be encountered on the street corner, where we, because we are frail and human, color it with the red or the green or the blue, the optimism or the pessimism, that happens to be in the paint pot we carry. To sum up, art requires a particular vision, a bias, or call it a prejudice. The most fortunate artist is one who possesses a sense of beauty. The satirist brings up a blush and anger along with our laughter. In the eighteenth century people saw this truth clearly. It is our fault, not theirs, that we call merely pretty what they called beautiful, and that we turn up our noses at their flowery art because the subways have taught us that coaches bearing painted cupids and garlands of flowers are frivolous.

A PAINTER OF FAIRY TALES

Charles Conder, dead in 1909, painted fantastic fairy tales on silk panels and fans. He was serious about his art, yet did not make it pompous. He worked assiduously. He was honest when, as did the artists of the eighteenth century, he sent Truth begging from his door. Tissot or Meissonier or Gerôme might have lifted horror-stricken hands at the spectacle; but their day has passed. They crowded the galleries of the Berlin Photographic Company during the exhibition of Conder's work. Conder, like Stevenson, pointed to charm as the right aim of art. He became a magician. He did not, as he attempted to do, make the Chelsea quarter the scene of a continuous fête champêtre of the eighteenth century. Truth foiled his effort, but did not open his eyes. He has left faintly yet indelibly inscribed fantasies that are a monument to the world of flowers where the hob-nailed shoe is a shocking and disastrous intruder. His people danced through life, and, because Truth, distributing consciences, was ever absent, they were never awkward.

A WELL-TRAINED GARDEN

Thirty-three pictures by twenty-five artists shown recently at the Macbeth Gallery were ordinary. The radicals wave red rags and are vulgar, for they incite fury in other living things. The Macbeth exhibition had the air of a well-trained garden, and a lawn, like those in England, conspicuously without dandelions. But perhaps this is too peaceful a picture. Rockwell Kent showed the "Burial of a Young Man," and Kenneth Hayes Miller, "The Pool," "The River," and "The Cloud." Mr. Kent is too much in love with life to bow servilely to art mandates, and too much in love with himself to be the slave of positive fact. He proves here the unalterable quality of his genius, even if he does not prove himself oblivious to the lure of the tempter, Imitation. He has stepped for a moment into the shoes of Arthur B. Davies, and assumed symbolism. But despite the little girl in white silhouetted against the blue-black of other mourners in the composition, to which so many have pointed with the whisper of scandal, he has not lost an iota of the particular incisiveness of his rendition. He is, to begin with, a master craftsman, a painter of astonishing ability, and a man of almost ruthless force.

His "Burial of a Young Man" is a greater presentation of himself, perhaps, than was the great black rock at Monhegan Island. It is puritanically austere, devoid of the slightest touch of intimacy, built upon a scale in which the life-giving details have no place. Indeed, the picture, when it attracts at all, attracts through admiration, just as does the preacher who formulates, in cold blood, a code of morals that must perforce overpower the weaker human to whom it can be nothing more nor less than a very rigid and unattainable ideal.

SUPERIOR TO LIFE

Kenneth Hayes Miller reassembles the classic traditions with figures that belie their regulations. He is a true classicist, fervid and sometimes inhuman. He reproduces not so much aspects of life as aspects of the purist aims that have glorified the lives of men. He does not deal with the world, but with a theory that aims to be superior to it. He assumes the Hellenistic ideal. Because he is particularly humble he presents his theories with particular grandeur, but despite this we feel in them a struggle like that carried on by primitive man with tremendous yet not perfectly controlled sinews.

ANGLO-SAXON COLOR

A recent Montross Gallery exhibition was a triumph of color precisely because color was subdued. It achieved its triumphs through a subtle suggestion rather than through a riot of color. That is an American or an Anglo-Saxon way to deal with color. Here we found J. Alden Weir controverting the Beaux Arts traditions so subtly that to realize his revolution was to be immeasurably surprised. Mr. Weir is, first and last, sympathetic and human. His "Reverie," the figure of a young girl, not particularly well favored, and dressed in white, charmed rather because the artist had put himself into his theme than because his theme was buoyed by the model. Happily the painter is not entertained by the surface of things in life any more than he is entertained by them in paint.

D. W. Tryon in three landscapes, not this time instigated by a love of parallel lines, showed an interest in nature similar to that of Thoreau's. I do not mean that Mr. Tryon apes Thoreau; far from it; he is of those who wear the frock coats that Thoreau despised. He explains himself politely, careful to avoid rude language or any possible shock to his hearers. But he does explain nature minutely; he depicts the character of the bush in the foreground as attentively as that of the slender tree, naked for the winter, towering a hundred yards farther back.

J. Francis Murphy amused himself with "The Old Home" and "Autumnal" by plying his color to his favorite cadence. He was luxuriant and painter-like, but certainly not too truthful. With more truth, Henry C. Lee in "San Francisco Square, Havana," gave another aspect of luxuriance. We may wonder if the sun is not harder and harsher than Mr. Lee seems willing to admit, and yet we can not help thanking him for lending to it a more optimistic view.

His little canvas was one of the gems of the collection. It sustained a high note which others too often make metallic. Elliot Daingerfield is an intellectual who soars too high. His "Adrift" and "Gloaming Hour" attracted as patterns of color, but failed to give utterance to the ideas that the painter had wished to convey. Albert P. Ryder, who might have been Mr. Daingerfield's master, pointed, with "White Horse," to the wealth of nature. He was not, as your horseman would have him, bothered by anatomical considerations. One may not confute him here, however, for though his title may deny it, he was not speaking particularly of a horse.

A more direct talent is that of W. L. Lathrop, who was represented by "Verdure Clad Hills," "The Plowed Field," and "Fields in Summer." Mr. Lathrop has no ideal but nature. He sits before her to copy her. His pictures display a virtuous fidelity, and at the same time their special note is one of quiet, refined content. No other landscape painter that we can readily call to mind so thoroughly discards, as does Mr. Lathrop, the turmoil of cities.

THE BRILLIANT MR. CLEWS

Mr. Henry Clews, Junior's, introduction to the catalogue of his exhibition at the E. Gimpel and Wildenstein Galleries is so interesting that, were it not so lengthy, we should be tempted to reprint it here. Clever and entertaining, spotted with words of his own invention, it is the key to his art, which is rather ingenious and attractive than important. It promises to become the last. It has the fine point of the rapier as well as its fault—it is brittle. He attacks society at the same time that he gives the impression of his eccentricity. He is capable, light, quick, incisive. His painting owes a great debt to Whistler, and is too much, perhaps, a borrowed garment to sit very well on his shoulders. There are but five pictures in his collection, but there are seventeen pieces of sculpture. In the latter he is happier. His bronze version of Don Quixote de la Mancha, head held high, lends to that romantic an aspect at once puritanical and severe. It is Quixote refusing eggs on Friday, or with dignity attacking the windmill; Quixote rigidly pursuing an ideal and oblivious to the beauty that came so often within his grasp. Robert W. Chandler, in another bronze "version," is shown clutching a monkey to his breast; his head is thrown back, and his physical force, as displayed in neck and shoulders, is particularly dwelt upon. Other sculptures here were a bust of Mrs. Watson-Watson Wahlig (it did not flatter the sitter), "The Gold Fish," "The Frog Princess," "The Absinthe Drinker," "Christ," "Magdalen," "Satan," "Demon of Perversity," "Imp of Nosomania," a Cubist suggestion, "Imp of Preciosity," "Rough Diamond Hypocrisy," and the "Vicious Circle."

Etchings by Charles Meryon at the Knoedler Gallery were superior in many ways to those shown from the point of Whistler. There were forty-one by the American, and ten by the "Mad Etcher of Paris." But perhaps this is an unfair comparison. The Meryon prints were particularly choice. They were the "Tourelle, rue de la Tixeranderie," "Le Petit Pont," "La Pompe Notre Dame," "La Galerie de Notre Dame," "Le Stryge," "L'Abside de Notre Dame," "Saint Étienne du Mont," "Le Pont au Change," and the "Arms Symbolical of the City of Paris," Meryon's first original plate.

The last exhibition of the season at the Folsom Gallery consisted of twenty-four paintings by Howard Russell Butler that, while good technically, were not impressive artistically. Mr. Butler tries too persistently to emulate the camera. He borrows his drawing from his subject, and colors it in shades borrowed elsewhere which give, even to his exactitude, a note of artificiality.

MARIUS DE ZAYAS, CARICATURIST

Caricatures, absolute and relative, by Marius De Zayas, created admiration, wonder, and ridicule at the Photo-Secession Gallery. The best of them was of the absolute coterie—a portrait of John Marin, who has added much to the glory of the Woolworth Building by rendering, in water color, his untrammelled impression of it. Mr. De Zayas explains himself better than anyone else could explain him. Here is his own explanation: "During my experience in the practice of caricature I have come to the conclusion, through experimental analysis, that the facial expression and the expression of the body of a man reveal only his habits, his social customs; never, or at any rate very seldom, his psychological self, and absolutely never his specific value, place, or significance in relation to existing things."

"Now matter can not exist without spirit, nor can spirit exist without matter. But, though they are inseparable, they constitute two different entities. We cannot therefore represent the spirit of a thing by its purely material entity. We cannot represent materially something that is essentially immaterial, unless we do it by the use of symbols. Mathematics are essentially symbolical; they are the purest expression of symbolism. They represent material or immaterial things by abstract equivalents. We can represent psychological and metaphysical entities by algebraic signs, and solve their problems through mathematics. We can represent the plastic psychology and the plastic metaphysics of matter by their geometric equivalents. But we can not represent both the psychology and the metaphysics of spirit and matter by only one of the two methods. In order, then, to have a perfect representation of an existing thing, we must represent it in its two essential principles, spirit and matter, but also in conjunction with a third principle: the initial force of the individual; force which binds the spirit and the matter and makes them actuate. This initial force marks the specific value of things."

It is barely possible that Mr. De Zayas is having, or trying to have, a little fun at the expense of the gullible. GUY PÈNE DU BOIS.

best effects by turning life topsy-turvy and forcing the spectator to look at the picture upside down; and we now perceive that this method of satire was invented by Pinero in "The Amazons." Suffice it to say that he has satirized the "new woman" movement that was current in the early nineties by the expedient of treating three young girls as if they were boys, and thereby betraying the futility of any endeavor to repress the natural distinction of the sexes. The mood of the comedy is more amicably human than the habitual mood of Mr. Shaw, and the characters, though fantastic, are logically drawn. The dialogue, though written in a style more formal than that to which the author has ascended in his later works, still produces a tonic impression by its readiness of wit. "The Amazons," viewed at a distance of twenty years, can scarcely be regarded as a masterpiece of comedy; it suffers by comparison with later plays—"The Gay Lord Quex," for instance; but considered in its historical setting, it indicates that twenty years ago Sir Arthur Pinero was already as far in advance of his contemporaries as he remains, by virtue of "Mid-Channel" and "The Thunderbolt," to-day.

"ARIZONA"

MR. AUGUSTUS THOMAS'S "Arizona" is a younger play, and exhibits no antiquity of method. It is only thirteen years since this interesting melodrama ran a season in New York and repeated its success in London. It is the best work that Mr. Thomas produced in that middle period of his career when he was still contented to write plays, and did not deem it his duty to preach to the public on a wide variety of topics.

"Arizona" is clever in plot, skilful in characterization, delightful in dialogue. The familiar story of the drama is still accepted with enthusiasm by a contemporary audience. Yet a reasonable critic may be pardoned for pointing out that the essential theme of the play exploits an order of heroics that has already been rejected by intelligent individuals, and is sure to be discarded before many years by the less active-minded public. The hero puts himself apparently in the wrong by refusing to make a simple statement which, though clearing his own honor, would be embarrassing to a woman who has been guilty of a grievous indiscretion; and the woman, being a coward, neglects to say the word which, revealing the truth about herself, would establish the innocence of the hero. In this situation, we are asked to sympathize with the behavior of both the woman and the man; but this behavior, on both sides, is actuated by a medieval code that can find no favor in a modern and reasonable mind. By sacrificing himself, the hero sacrifices also the girl who loves him, and destroys the happiness of many people for the sake of shielding an erring woman who deserves to be exposed. The satisfaction of behaving, in the old phrase, "like a gentleman" can scarcely be considered an adequate compensation for this general untruthfulness of attitude. Neither, in this twentieth century, can we forgive the woman for consenting to the sacrifice and allowing her protector to set several lives awry in order to cover up her indiscretion. We demand that she also should behave "like a gentleman," and confess her fault in order to establish the innocence of the hero. But if the heroine of "Arizona" should rise to our reasonable expectation in this regard, the play would be terminated in the second act and all the subsequent complication would be made impossible. Even the murder of the villain at the third curtain-fall would be prevented if the woman should show herself sufficiently honorable to speak the truth at the crisis of the second act. This point is the inherent weakness of the play; and if "Arizona" is again revived a score of years from now, a more enlightened audience will reject it, because such an audience will no longer be able to sympathize with the moral weakness of the heroine's behavior.

"COUNTESS JULIA"

AUGUST STRINDBERG'S hideous and mighty tragedy, entitled "Countess Julia," was recently presented in New York at three special matinées. The purpose of the production was to introduce a new actress to the stage. She showed herself entirely unfitted for her work, and courtesy demands that her name should not be mentioned; but she was ably supported by that excellent actor, Mr. Frank Reicher, and the production was sufficiently good to make the critic wish that he might some day have the privilege of seeing the piece adequately acted in every part.

This play, which was written as long ago as 1888, is more modern in its technique than most of the compositions of the present season. It still speaks the last word in the naturalistic handling of the stage. The action, which is unfolded in a single lengthy scene, covers an entire night, from mid-evening until dawn. Only three speaking characters are represented, but certain intervals of time are summarized in pantomime by these and several other people. This device of suggesting in a single act the passage of an entire night, with which we have been made familiar in Mr. Belasco's one-act version of "Madame Butterfly," is thus shown to be an invention of the myriad-minded Swede.

The content of this little play is very horrible. The action passes in the kitchen of a castle upon Midsummer Eve—a holiday occasion, when it is customary for the gentry to dance with the peasants who are tenanted on their estates. In the heat of this democratic celebration, a neurotic and hysterical countess (aged twenty-five) tantalizes her father's valet into seducing her. The scene leading up to this abhorrent climax is a very remarkable study of the mental pathology of sex. The subsequent situation of the countess and the valet is one of abject despair. The countess does not dare remain at home; she does not dare to run away alone; and she realizes that, if she elopes with the valet, they will merely hate each other. A vivid suggestion is conveyed of the fierce warfare that is waged between plebeians who are rising through the generations and patricians who are simultaneously descending. In this instance, the rising scion of a new family and the falling scion of an old family have met, for one moment of insanity, to wreck and ruin their divided destinies. The play ends, in a moment of great terror, with a prevision that the countess is about to cut her throat with a razor.

This tragedy is sternly true of the mad and despicable people that it represents; but it stands apart, in theme and content, from the general and generous experience of humankind. It is a clinical, and not a universal, work. But it is amazing in its psychological subtlety, and, because of its perfectness of art, it must be ranked very high among the achievements of modern European drama.

Exercise The Muscles of Your Face

And Restore Youthful Expression and Beauty

When the skin and muscles of the face lose their elasticity, the face sags all out of shape, nose to mouth lines, lines about eyes, mouth and forehead, and double chin appear, and tissues become flabby. The skin of the neck looks withered and yellow and deep lines form.

My system of facial exercises, by restoring elasticity to the skin and muscles, removes and prevents these marks of age. It is equally valuable for too thin or too plump face or neck. Massage, vibratory, electrical and other external treatments cannot exercise even the superficial muscles well and they cannot exercise the deeper muscles at all. These deep muscles must be exercised to restore or preserve youthful appearance.

My new booklet "FACIAL EXERCISE," fully describes my system. It tells how young women may enhance and preserve and how mature women may restore facial charm. No one is too old to benefit. Write for my book to-day—FREE.

On Her DRESSING TABLE

MORE than usually interesting is a new powder preparation for restoring the color of the neck when it has become discolored

by tight collars or sunburn. A teaspoonful of the powder should be measured out upon a soft, wet, wash cloth, and the neck and throat thoroughly washed with it. If the skin is super-sensitive, the powder may be poured on the hands and moistened with enough water to make a copious suds, and the neck washed with the hands instead of a wash cloth. For the first two weeks this process should be repeated twice daily, but after that time, once each day will be sufficient. Each $1 jar of powder contains enough to last five weeks, by which time the discoloration of the neck should have vanished. The continued use of the powder should keep the skin of the throat and neck in perfect condition. Care should be observed not to overdo the treatment or to rub the skin too severely. All directions on the jar should be carefully followed. The temperature of the water used should be warm, not hot.

A most delightfully refreshing shampoo powder for the hair is strongly redolent of the balsamic pines. It is very cleansing as well as strengthening to the scalp. Two teaspoonfuls of this powder should be added to each pint of hot water used. As in the case of all other shampoo mixtures, the hair should be carefully rinsed with a spray or in several bowlfuls of clear water after washing. Nothing more stimulating for the purpose or more deliciously fragrant has ever been shown in the shops. Price, 50 cents.

For those who occasionally prefer a dry shampoo to the less arduous labor of washing the head with soap and water, there is a new preparation which not only cleanses the hair but stimulates the scalp by reason of the way in which the powder is applied. It is sprinkled on the dry hair, sifted through it, and worked well into the scalp with a light rotary movement of the finger tips. This massage will loosen any skin deposits that may be adhering to the roots of the hair. After a thorough massage has been given, the powder is brushed out with a fairly stiff brush, by dividing the hair again and again so as to allow the brush to reach the scalp. This powder has a slight floral scent that lingers pleasantly in the hair after the shampoo. Price, $1.

VANITIES OF THE TOILET

A small collection of carefully chosen and unique toilet preparations is to be found at a private establishment where facial massage is given, and where every detail of the care of the person has been the subject of exhaustive study. These preparations are all European products of rare value, and they can not be obtained elsewhere. No better preparation of its kind can be found than a lip stick the color of which is derived from scarlet rose leaves. This stick gives no impression of rouge having been used. The price is $1, very inexpensive for so fine a product. It acts like a skin food for the lips as well as a coloring matter, and keeps them soft, pliable, and of perfect finish. One may order the stick perfumed with rose or violet, as preferred.

A rose jelly for the hands is an equally delicate preparation which sells for $1.50 a jar. It prevents roughness or dryness, and is immediately absorbed by the pores of the skin, so that one can sew or write at once without feeling the least stickiness.

In New York is established a Frenchman who has originated a series of excellent toilet preparations. Chief among these aids to beauty is a rouge that is neither the usual powder nor liquid, but a fabric chemically treated with rouge. This bit of cloth is rubbed on the face with the degree of intensity desired, and the effect is absolutely natural. The cloth is folded in an attractive, small box, in the hinged cover of which is a mirror. Price, 35 cents.

A FACE CREAM AND CHAMOIS

A "vanishing" cream is also to be found at this same establishment. It is a non-oily substance, and after it has been gently rubbed into the skin, it leaves no traces. The massage and consequent absorption naturally serve the purpose of invigorating and feeding the tissues. A two-ounce jar costs 50 cents, and a four-ounce jar, 75 cents.

In a dainty guise, that beloved standby, the face chamois, comes to us tinted in flesh color and sealed hygienically in a transparent paper envelope. The color of the chamois harmonizes with the flesh tone of the powder. These chamois cloths come in two sizes, costing 10 and 15 cents, respectively.

A BASKET OF DAINTY PREPARATIONS

An ingenious mind has dared to substitute for the Easter basket of flowers or the bon-voyage offering of fruits, a wonderful basket overflowing with dainty toilet articles. The basket makes a very gay appearance with its ribbon drapings and variegated packages of imported soaps and rare perfumes, put up after the manner of handsome, overgrown bonbons. One basket is a high-handled, imported shape worthy the distinction of being used as a bridesmaid's flower-holder.

The baskets may be had in various colorings; one is of natural straw tinted in tones of violet, and ornamented with violet satin ribbon. Another shows rustic, woody tones of browns and greens, offset by a yellow satin ribbon. In the matter of the contents of the basket, one may choose different face powders, rare creams, and perfumes. The baskets alone are $3.

A FIBROUS GLOVE

For the beautifying of the hands there are exquisitely made gloves endorsed with the name of an eminent physician of France. The gloves are made of a curious, fibrous substance which is as soft as chamois to the touch. The cut is very loose and large, and for cracked skin, redness, coarseness of texture, or chapping, they can not be too highly recommended. It is sufficient to try these gloves during one night to realize the benefit they confer upon the skin. When speedy results are desired, special creams or pastes are to be used before slipping the gloves on at night. They cost $20 a pair.

The PRIZE CONTEST

"Answers to Correspondents"

"While I haven't yet asked Vogue a question, I never fail to read the questions and answers, and nearly always profit by them."

THIS quotation from a Prize Contest letter already received suggests the two ways of using Vogue's "Answers to Correspondents" department. First, of course, you can write to Vogue exactly as you would write to a friend. Your question will be promptly answered. It may be on almost any subject—dress, manners, household decoration, toilet preparations, wedding etiquette, etc., ad infinitum.

And even if you have not yet asked Vogue a question, the answers which we publish from time to time make profitable reading. Here are a few typical questions that have been put to us:

"Will you tell me a wardrobe suitable for travelling through Egypt and Greece, leaving New York the end of February?"

"Can you suggest an appropriate name for our bungalow?"

"Please give a description of a completely furnished boudoir."

"Can one travel comfortably second-class in Holland?"

"Do Americans living abroad use their crests on visiting cards?"

"What clothes must I and my husband take for a motor trip abroad?"

Perhaps you have asked a more interesting question than any of these. If you have ever used the "Answers to Correspondents" department—in either of the ways suggested above—don't fail to tell us about it in your Prize Contest letter.

Conditions of the Contest

The title of the contest is "Have You Used Vogue—and How?" The answers are to center around these five departments:

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS
SEEN IN THE SHOPS
ADVERTISEMENTS
SHOPPING SERVICE
PATTERN SERVICE

Tell your experiences with each of these departments. The best all-round letter will win the first prize of $50; there is a second prize of $25; and five $10 prizes for the five letters that tell the most interesting experiences with each of the five departments mentioned above. To be eligible for a $10 prize, you need only write about one department.

The contest closes July 10th. The names of the writers will not be published, but we may print some of the letters, either in whole or in part. Please typewrite your letter, if possible; otherwise write it very clearly on one side of the paper.

There will be more news of the contest in the next Vogue. Letters should be addressed:

THIS TRIAL PACKAGE

Exactly the size pictured here. For You have never seen anything like it before—an absolutely sterile 10c Rice Powder—packaged without the powder being touched by human hands. It serves every purpose better than the finest talcum and equals in effect the highest grade face powder.

ELCAYA RICE POWDER

"Scented and Unscented"

The "scented" is like an old-fashioned garden of flowers. For every toilet use, it is unequalled. It gives the complexion that well-groomed effect without showing the slightest trace on the skin—it positively does not cause the shiny appearance common to talcum. After the bath it gives that clean, natural, comfortable feeling so much sought—so hard to obtain.

FOR THE NURSERY

and general toilet uses, the "unscented" is a marvel. It cools and heals baby's skin; prevents chafing, rash, prickly heat, and does not cake on the skin or crinkle like the talcum. It is safe for mother and mother's baby—absolutely sterile, free from contamination—the acme of purity and quality. Like all other ELCAYA toilet helps, it is the best your money can buy.

Author of “Miss Jerry,” “Richard Gordon,” etc.

“A gem of a love story,” is what the Brooklyn “Eagle” calls this romance of a man and a girl on a tropical island in the Pacific. “Worked out very daintily and prettily with a blithesome, humorous touch,” says the “Standard Union” of the same city; and the eminent inventor and author, Hudson Maxim, says: “Mr. Black is an imaginative artist who has made good use of the insular paradisiacal opportunity.” Frontispiece by Orson Lowell. $1.25 net; postage 12c.

GERTRUDE

By EDWARD HUNGERFORD

Author of “Little Corky,” “The Modern Railroad,” etc.

In “Gertrude,” the reader of this strong, enveloping romance will find a marked contrast with the average drawing-room heroine, the wishy-washy, doll-like young woman whose province is only to be loved and won. “Gertrude” is a real American girl, the kind of girl who achieves the big things of life today, and her story is told with rare insight, humor and realism. This model shows another triumph of the Peetz Corset art. It is lightly boned to give the flexible uncorseted effect—narrow hips, medium low bust, long skirt effect. This is only one of the many new Peetz Front Lace Corset styles—"the highest art in corseting." We want to show you the other styles, and if you write us will send you facts about them.

There is an indefinable difference in the Peetz Corset which is explained only in the wearing.

"Tenement Tommy" Asks for A Square Deal

HE lives in New York's tenement district, the most congested spot in America.

In his sultry three-room home there is scarcely space to eat and sleep. His playground is the blistering pavement of the ill-smelling streets, hemmed in by scorching brick walls.

Tommy's widowed mother is broken with worry; his sisters and brothers are as pallid and frail as he. The winter struggle has sapped their vitality. They are starving for air.

No medicine will help Tommy. What he, his mother and the other children need are: a chance to breathe something pure and fresh,—a taste of sunshine and outdoor freedom,—an outing in the country or at the seashore.

But between Tommy and his needs stands poverty, the result of misfortune. He must suffer just as if it were all his fault.

This Association every summer sends thousands of "Tenement Tommies", mothers and babies to the country and to Sea Breeze, its fresh air home at Coney Island. A dollar bill, a five dollar check, or any amount you care to contribute, will help us to answer Tommy's appeal.

Send contributions to Robert Shaw Minturn, Treasurer, Room 204, 105 East 22nd Street, New York City.

THE TWO GREAT STORIES OF THE YEAR ARE IN SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE

EDITH WHARTON'S THE CUSTOM OF THE COUNTRY A Story of American Social Life

It is seldom that an author makes her characters as real as does Mrs. Wharton in "The Custom of the Country." Undine Spragg, the social climber; her father, Abner E. Spragg, with some old-fashioned prejudices but no business scruples; Mrs. Spragg—"Leota B."; Elmer E. Moffatt, the plunger; Mrs. Heeny, the gossiping manicure; Claud Walsingham Popple, the fashionable portrait painter; Peter Van Degen, the rich man about town, with whom Undine has an adventure, and Ralph Marvell, the scion of an old Washington Square family, who married Undine—are as living as if we had seen them in a play.

From Philadelphia (Pa.) Item.

It was announced early in the year that 1913 would be a year of extraordinary fiction in the magazine. Mrs. Wharton's novel, "The Custom of the Country," has clearly fulfilled this promise, and it has been received as one of the most absorbing stories of this most remarkable writer.

THE BEST LOVE STORY JOHN GALSWORTHY'S THE DARK FLOWER (The Love Life of a Man)

It is a story of sentiment, of ideals, written in a poetic vein and with an intimate appeal to all mankind, to all who have ever loved or known the influence of love. If you will read the first chapters in the April number you will be convinced that it is a story you must read, one that will touch the hearts, appeal to the sympathies of old and young alike.

From Pittsburg (Pa.) Dispatch.

In the April SCRIBNER'S appears the first chapters of John Galsworthy's novel, "The Dark Flower (The Love Life of a Man) Spring—Summer—Autumn." Few of all the love stories ever written have such a universal appeal as this one.

You will certainly want to read Short Stories by Mary R. S. Andrews, author of "The Perfect Tribute"; Ernest Thompson Seton, James B. Connolly, Thomas Nelson Page, and other famous writers of fiction

SPECIAL: A Reprint of the earlier chapters of Mrs. Wharton's story will be sent free to any one upon request

Another says: "Last May I weighed 100 pounds, this May I weight 126, and oh! I feel SO WELL."

Vogue's Shoppers Will Do Your Summer Errands

When you are miles from the shops this summer, you may have to buy many things at short notice. Accidents will happen. You may suddenly miss your sweater, your motor coat; the damp grass may spoil your white slippers; there may be dozens of similar emergencies. But Vogue will be always ready to do the troublesome shopping for you.

And shopping is doubly troublesome in the hot weather, when the best shops are far away. The flowers may fade on your hat. The lace on your gown may be torn beyond repair in the laundry. The tennis court may need new marking tapes. The children are sure to need fresh ribbons. Remember that Vogue's shoppers are always at your service. With the best shops at our elbow, there is no shopping emergency that we cannot meet, and meet promptly.

It is very easy to use the Vogue Shopping Service. You needn't make a hot, dusty trip to town. You needn't even leave your cool piazza. Simply send us a few pencilled lines telling your needs; the evening train will carry your message to the city, and in the morning we set out on your errand. Could anything be simpler?

The great stores hold important summer sales. Because "Vogue takes no holiday" we always go to them. Readers who give us their commissions in midsummer profit exceedingly on this account. And everywhere we go, in big shops or small, merchants take pains to show Vogue's shoppers their most inviting novelties.

"We have something new and want you to see it before anyone else," or "This isn't 'Vogue style'—let us show you our really good things." Remarks like these are commonplaces as we go into the summer shops.

This number of Vogue is a complete directory of the formal summer mode. It will be useful all summer. And be sure to use the following numbers, with their suggestions for buying outing clothes, and travelling outfits, and furniture for the summer home. As quickly as you decide what to buy Vogue will be ready to do the shopping for you.
